As to the reaſon of this continual burning of incenſe, tho' we grant, that it might be typical of the prayers of the ſaints, yet we believe, we may take that of the learned Maimon along with it, that the multitude of victims, that were continually offered up, would have made the holy place ſmell like a ſlaughter houſe, and conſequently have inſpired the comers rather with diſguſt and contempt than awe and reverence, had it not been over-powered by the agreeable fragrancy of theſe perfumes (27).

(21) Comp. Levit. x. 1, 2. v. xvi. 12. (22) Exod. xxx. 7. (23) Vide Luke i. 9. (24) Exod. xxx. 34, & ſeq. (25) 2 Kings. xx. 13. (26) 2 Chron. xvi. v. ult. (27) Ap. Baſnag. in Cun. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 12.

camp, were, after the building of the temple, to be burned out of the walls of the city.

Laws concerning vows.

Laws concerning vows.

AS theſe made a ſolemn part of the Jewiſh worſhip and offerings, they may properly be joined as an appendix to the former, tho' their being free and arbitrary doth not permit us to put them in the ſame rank. How ſoon they began to be in uſe we have ſeen an inſtance of, in Jacob's vowing the tenths of all his acquiſitions, as he went to Padan-aram †; however, we confine ourſelves to thoſe under the Moſaic diſpenſation, concerning which that lawgiver made ſeveral regulations, in order to direct and inforce the performance of them [c].

Vows were of a two-fold nature; namely, 1. Of ſuch as devoted the thing vowed, whether man, beaſt, money, or any part of a man's poſſeſſion, to the ſervice of GOD [d]. 2. Of ſuch as devoted them to utter deſtruction [e] (O). Under the firſt head it plainly appears, that perſons that were ſui juris, might vow themſelves, their children, or any part of their poſſeſſions, to God. We ſay ſui juris, becauſe the vows of a ſon or a daughter, of a wife or ſlave, were of no further force, than as they were approved, or diſapproved, by thoſe under whoſe power they were [f]. So that a parent, huſband, or maſter, if he heard the vow when it was made, or when he came afterwards to be informed of it, was at liberty either to give it a ſanction, or to diſannul it: but if the latter, he was obliged to do it on the ſame day, according to † See Vol. II. p. 461. [c] Levit. xxvii. paſſ. [d] Ibid. ver. 2. & ſeq. [e] Ibid. ver. 28. 29. [f] Num. xxx. paſſ.

(O) The original diſtinguiſhes them by the words נדר, Nadar, which ſignifies to vow, in the firſt ſenſe and חרם, Charam, which implies to lay a thing or perſon under an anathema, or to devote it or him to deſtruction. Several learned commentators indeed will not allow of this laſt meaning, when it relates to men; but think, that thoſe perſons who were thus vowed, were to become wholly devoted to God beyond the poſſibility of redemption (28); but the reader may ſee, by the inſtances which we ſhall give above, that it meant quite another thing; namely, the death of the perſon, and extermination and deſtruction of the thing anathematiſed; and that the difference between the firſt and ſecond vow was, that the firſt might be redeemed, but not the ſecond.

(28) Vide Munſt. Grot. Le Clerc. Pagnin. Jun. Calm.

the

the text, or in twenty four hours, according to the Jewiſh doctors.

OF perſons vowing themſelves in this ſenſe, we meet with no plain inſtance, but of their vowing their children we have, among others, that of Samuel, who was dedicated to God by his mother's vow, ratified, as is to be ſuppoſed from what we juſt now hinted, by her huſband[g]; and he was accordingly conſecrated to GOD's ſervice all his life-time. However, in theſe caſes the law of Moſes allowed of a redemption or commutation for a ſum of money, which was either greater or leſs, according to the age and ſex of the perſon vowed, for which the reader will find a rate fixed to each of them, and an allowance made for thoſe who were not able to pay that ſum, in the chapter above quoted concerning vows[h]. It was otherwiſe with reſpect to cattle, lands, or the product of them, and the like. For theſe could not be redeemed or exchanged, in any caſe, except, where a man had vowed, for inſtance, a lamb, calf, or any ſuch creature, which, before the time came of his offering it, had contracted any legal defect, which made it unfit for ſacrifice. For in ſuch caſes, he was to ſubſtitute another that was perfect and equivalent unto it, and if the beaſt which a man had vowed was an unclean one, he was, beſides the equivalent, to add a fifth part of its value by way of fine[i]. The ſame was to be obſerved if it was a houſe, field, or the like. As for the firſt-born of cattle, they could not be vowed, becauſe they belonged to GOD already[k].

THE caſe was quite different, with reſpect to thoſe things which were vowed to deſtruction; for they could not be redeemed at any rate[l]. That which had life was to be put to death, and that which had not was to be deſtroyed by fire, or ſome other way. We meet with various inſtances of it in the Jewiſh hiſtory, but ſhall ſingle only a few of the moſt remarkable. We may remember, that the children of Iſrael vowed the whole kingdom of Arad to deſtruction, and that all the cities of the Canaanites were under the ſame anathema[m], and more particularly Jericho; and that Achan, and all that he had, fell under the ſame curſe, becauſe he had ſaved ſome of the plunder of that city[n], which was to have been deſtroyed. As for Jephthah's vow, beſides that it was not exactly of the ſame nature, and authors are much divided, about the manner Anathemas of his fulfilling it, it will be more proper to examine it when we come to the hiſtory of that judge. The Iſraelites, aſſembled at Mizpeh, vowed thoſe to deſtruction that did not aſſiſt in puniſhing the tribe of Benjamin, for their barbarous uſage of the Levite's concubine [o] : and Saul would have ſacrificed his own ſon Jonathan, for ignorantly incurring the curſe, which he had laid upon thoſe, that ſhould eat or drink whilſt he was in purſuit of his victory; had not the whole army ſtrongly oppoſed it. By all which inſtances, and many more that could be brought, it appears, that nothing leſs than death was the lot of the perſons devoted by this kind of vows.

[g] 1 Sam. i. 21, & ſeq. [h] Levit. xxvii. 3. & ſeq. [i] Ibid. ver. 13. [k] Ibid. ver. 26. [l] Ibid. ver. 28. 29. [m] Num. xxi. 1. & ſeq. Deut vii. 23. & ſeq. xx. 15. & ſeq [n] Joſh. vi, vii, paſſ.

THOSE who think, that when they related to human victims, they meant no more than, that they ſhould be dedicated to GOD's ſervice as long as they lived, do indeed object the abhorrence which GOD expreſſes againſt all kind of human ſacrifices; but we beg leave to obſerve, that the caſe here is not about ſacrifices, but vows, and ſuch as, for ought appears to the contrary, by all the inſtances we meet with, were not in the power of private men to make, but only either of the whole nation, as in the caſe of the land of Arad, or of the kings and judges, as in the other inſtances above-mentioned. Beſides, they ſeem altogether to relate to thoſe idolatrous nations they were going to conquer, the meaſure of whoſe ſins had already provoked God to paſs ſentence of deſtruction againſt them; in which caſe, if they bound themſelves by a ſolemn vow to put it in execution, they would be more likely to fulfil it. Accordingly we find them very exact where that was the caſe, and as remiſs when it was not; elſe they had not left ſo many nations undeſtroyed, to be a continual ſnare to ſeduce them into all manner of idolatries. If therefore it was of ſo great conſequence to them to remove all ſuch dangerous incitements, we need not wonder, if they were in ſome meaſure led into it by the ſtronger obligation of an oath. But after all, this precept may be only an inforcement of that vow, which Moſes had exacted of the whole nation a little before his death †, of obſerving all the commandments of GOD; one of which was the extirpation of all theſe nations, with all their monuments of idolatry: in which caſe the meaning of thoſe words will be only this, that as they had ſolemnly vowed it to God, they muſt not pretend,

[o] Judg. xxi. 5. † See before, p. 38.

hereafter

hereafter to exempt themſelves from it, upon any pretence whatever (P).

WHAT curſe Jonadab the ſon of Rechab had laid upon his poſterity, if they did not obſerve his arbitrary injunctions, of abſtaining from wine, from planting, ſowing, and the like, doth not appear; but how ſtrict obſervers they were of them, we may conclude from their anſwer to Jeremiah, when he invited them to drink wine [p]. We ſhall conclude this article with a ſhort account of the Nazarites, often mentioned in the Old Teſtament, who were perſons that either dedicated themſelves, or were ſo by their parents, to obſerve the laws of nazaritehood. Theſe were of two ſorts; namely, of ſuch who obliged themſelves to it only for ſome ſhort ſpace, as a week or a month, and thoſe who were bound to it all their life; and theſe were moſt commonly dedicated by their parents. Of this kind were Samſon and Samuel [q], and all that we find peculiar in their way of life was, that they were to abſtain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, and to wear their hair to its full length. As for thoſe of the firſt Nazarites.

[p] Jerem. xxxv. paſſ. [q] Judg. xiii v. 1 Sam. i. 11.

(P) Thoſe who underſtand the original know, that the future tenſe is very often uſed for the paſt, and ſo vice verſa: ſo that the words may be properly rendered, ſhall have vowed, inſtead of ſhall vow. Theſe two verſes therefore ſeem to us, to come in as an exception to the regulations which Moſes, had made a little before, concerning the redemption of thoſe things which had been vowed in the firſt ſenſe; and which he therefore prefaces with the word אך Ak, notwithſtanding, or nevertheleſs, whatſoever ſhall be vowed in the ſecond ſenſe, that is, to deſtruction, whether of men or beaſts, &c. ſhall not be redeemed, but be put to death: that is, ye have all bound yourſelves, by a ſolemn oath, to deſtroy all thoſe nations that will not accept of proffered peace, and forſake their idolatry, and to eliminate all that belongs to them; remember therefore, that there is no redemption for them, and that if you ſuffer yourſelves, either through pity or covetouſneſs, to ſpare any of them, you will not only incur the puniſhment of perjury and rebellion, but be inſnared into greater guilt, by conforming to their ways. Had Saul been mindful of this, he had not ſaved the king of Amalek, and the choiceſt of the cattle and plunder (29). When therefore he made that weak and puerile excuſe, that he deſigned the latter as an offering to God, Samuel did juſtly reprove him, by ſhewing him, how vain it was to pretend to at one for one open violation of God's command by another.

(29) 1 Sam. xv. 9. & ſeq.

ſort,

ſort, they were moreover to avoid all defilement, even that of entering into a houſe where a dead perſon was; for if they chanced to be polluted by it before the term was expired, they were obliged to begin afreſh [r]. Women as well as men might bind themſelves to this vow, and after it was accompliſhed, they preſented themſelves to the prieſt, who brought them to the door of the tabernacle or temple, where they offered the ſacrifices preſcribed by Moſes in ſuch caſes [s], after which he cauſed their heads to be ſhaved, and the hair to be thrown into the fire which was under the ſacrifice, and then pronounced them freed from their vow.

THOSE that lived at ſuch a diſtance from the temple, that they could not reach it by that time their vow was expired, might ſhave their heads at what place ſoever they found themſelves; at which time they ſet aſide the price of their ſacrifice, in order to bring or ſend it to the temple by the next opportunity. This is what we find St. Paul did, who made this vow at Corinth, ſhaved his head at Cenchrea, and went ſoon after to Jeruſalem, to accompliſh it by the uſual offering [t].

Laws concerning the Prieſts, Levites, and Nethinims.

Laws concerning the prieſts.

THE two laſt things to be conſidered under this head, of the worſhip of GOD, or as it is commonly called, the commands of the firſt table, are, 1. The perſons, and 2. The things, which were in a more peculiar manner conſecrated to his ſervice. Of the firſt ſort were the prieſts, Levites, and Nethinims; of the ſecond, the tabernacle, and afterwards the temple, with all the pompous apparatus of utenſils, preſcribed by GOD himſelf to Moſes on the mount, in order to inſpire the carnal people with a greater awe and reverence for his religion. As to the tribe of Levi, we have ſeen above how, and upon what account, it was ſeparated from the reſt, and appointed for this important office †. Before that time the prieſthood, or ſacrificature, is generally thought to have belonged to the firſt-born; and when Moſes ratified the covenant between GOD and the people at the mount, he acted the part of chief-prieſt, and choſe a ſet of young men to act under him [u]; but after the tribe of Levi had been thus ſet apart for the inferior, and the family of Aaron for the higher, offices of the miniſtry, it became a capital crime for any other tribe

[r] Num. vi. 1, & ſeq. [s] Ibid. ver. 13, & ſeq. [t] Acts xviii. 18. † See before p. 28. [u] Exod. xxiv. 5, & ſeq.

tribe to interfere with them in the ſacred function; inſomuch that GOD's vengeance did miraculouſly diſplay itſelf, in the puniſhment of the firſt offenders, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and in confirming the prieſthood in that family by the ſupernatural budding of Aaron's rod [w]. It is not indeed eaſy to reconcile what is ſaid of the Levites being choſen above all other tribes, upon the account of the zeal which they ſhewed in puniſhing the worſhippers of the golden calf [x], with Aaron's being raiſed to the higheſt dignity in that tribe, he who had ſo baſely conſented to and countenanced that defection. This choice may therefore more properly be aſcribed to the mere pleaſure of GOD, like that which he made before of Seth, Noah, Shem, Abraham, Jacob, David, and many more. But however that be, Moſes tells us in another place, that GOD took the Levites inſtead of the firſt-born of Iſrael, to be his own tribe, and it is remarkable, that when the ſums of both were taken, and the number of the latter exceeded that of the former, he commanded that the overplus ſhould be redeemed, at the price of five ſhekels per head, and the price to be given to Aaron and his ſons [y]. So that it is plain, that here was an actual ſubſtitution or exchange of the Levitical tribe in lieu of the firſt-born, which God had claimed to himſelf for his having ſpared theſe of Iſrael, when he deſtroyed thoſe of Egypt; and a ſuperiority given to the family of Aaron over all the reſt of that tribe, both as to office and dignity, as we ſhall preſently ſhew under each head. As for the Nethinims, they were not ſo much as of the ſeed of Jacob, and we only rank them here, as being appointed to ſerve in the loweſt offices of the tabernacle and temple.

I. Of the prieſts.

WE have heretofore taken notice, that the tribe of Levi conſiſted of three main branches, diſtinguiſhed by their principal heads, namely, Gerſhon, Kohath, and Merari. But the prieſthood was given ſolely to the family of Aaron, which was no more than a ſmall branch of that of Kohath; whilſt all the reſt of it, even the ſons of Moſes himſelf, as well as the other two branches, remained in the common rank of Levites; and were only admitted to the inferior functions of the miniſtry, [w] Numb. xvi, & xvii, paſſ. [x] Deut. xxxiii. 8, & ſeq. & Exod. xxxii. 26, & ſeq. [y] Vid. Numb. iii, 12, 13, 45, & ſeq.

whether

whether of the tabernacle, or afterwards of the temple. So that these were always subject to, and dependent on, the priests, as will appear in its proper place.

AT the head of the priesthood was the high-priest, who was also the head of the Jewish church, and the final judge of all controversies, whether concerning religion, or even about the administration of common justice. This last at least seems plainly implied in the directions, which Moses gives the people, to have recourse to the priests in all difficulties of that nature, and to abide by their determination under pain of death [z] (Q): and in this sense Josephus, Philo, and almost, if not, all the Jewish rabbies understand them [a]. However, in this respect he acted rather as a civil judge, than as high-priest. The same may be said of the subaltern priests and Levites, which were commonly admitted to sit in their inferior courts of judicature; for it is plain, that the main end for which they were set apart, was to bless the people in God's name, and to offer up incense and those sacrifices to him that were prescribed by the law, exclusive of all other tribes [b], under the severe penalties above-mentioned (R).

THE

[z] Deut. xvii. 8, & seq. xix. 17. xxi. 5. vide &. Ezek. xliv. 24.
[a] Cont. Apion. & alib. PHIL. MAIMON. Vide SELDEN de Synedr. vet. Hebr. & al. [b] Num. xvi. 8. & alib.

(Q) The words of Moses run thus (30). If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, between blood and blood, between plea and plea, and between stroke and stroke, being a matter of controversy within thy gates' (the sense of which from the last words is plainly, that if the matter is too hard for the judges of that city to which the contending parties belong (31), in such a case) 'then shalt thou arise, and get thee up into the place which the Lord thy God shall choose, and thou shalt come unto the priests and Levites, and unto the judge that shall be in those days——and thou shalt exactly observe and do according to their sentence——without swerving from it to the right hand or to the left —— and the man that shall presumptuously refuse to abide by the determination of the priest, that standeth to minister there before the Lord thy God, or to that of the judge, that man shall be put to death——'. Now by the priest there mentioned, the generality of commentators understand the high priest.

(R) This ought not however, to be understood too strictly, because it is certain, that several kings, judges, and prophets, have

(30) Deut. xvii. 8, & seq. (31) See Vol. II. p. 378.

THE laws relating to the high-prieſt are reducible to theſe three heads; 1. Such as related to his office. 2. To his conſecration. And 3. To his dreſs.

As to his office, beſides his having it in his power, whenever he pleaſed to perform any of the functions of the inferior prieſts; his being alone poſſeſſed of the divine oracle of Urim and Thummim, ſpoken of more particularly in a former ſection ‡, and his being alone authorized to enter into the holy of holies, and to pronounce that ſolemn bleſſing on the day of expiation, mentioned under that head; all theſe great privileges were confined to him, and intailed on his ſon and ſucceſſor, either of his own body or family. Accordingly we find the two branches of it, that of Eleazar and that of Ithamar, the ſons of Aaron, in the high-prieſthood at different times, till the captivity, whilſt the other occupied the next in rank: and this is the moſt probable reaſon why the prophet mentions a high-prieſt, and a The high-prieſt's office.

‡ See before p. 30. note (C).

taken this office upon them, that were not of that tribe. Thus we read in one place, that Samuel, who was of that of Ephraim, was waited for to bleſs the ſacrifice (32); and in another, that he offered up a lamb for a burnt-offering (33), tho' theſe two functions did properly belong to the prieſts. Thus again, Saul, Elijah, and David, are ſaid to have offered up burnt-offerings to God (34); and both he and his ſon Solomon to have bleſſed the people in the name of the Lord (35).

It is indeed commonly anſwered, that they only cauſed the prieſts to perform that office for them; but this expoſition is forced, and incompatible with the plain meaning of the original. We think it therefore more probable, that theſe perſons above named, not ſo much as being heads of the people, but as being prophets, and being directed by the ſpirit, might perform theſe functions upon particular occaſions, ſuch as theſe we have quoted, for the greater ſolemnity of the ceremony. For even Saul was for ſome time endowed with the ſpirit, and Samuel told him, that he might follow the directions of it upon all emergencies (36); when therefore that prophet reproved him for his indiſcretion (37), it is not ſo much for having offered up a burnt-offering, as for doing it contrary to his judgment, and out of an untimely fear, leſt Samuel ſhould diſappoint him, and his enemies ſurprize him unprepared; for Saul adds, and I forced, or did violence to myſelf, that is, my fear drove me to this action, contrary to my own judgment.

(32) 1 Sam. ix. 13. (33) Ibid. vii 9. (34) Ibid. xiii. 9. & ſeq. 1 Kings xviii. 30, & ſeq. (35) 2 Sam. vi. 17, 18. 1 Kings viii. 55, & ſeq. (36) Vide 1 Sam. x. 7, & ſeq. (37) Ibid. xiii. 13.

second priest *†. How Phinehas's line came to be set aside from the first rank, the text doth not tell us: but the legal imperfections, which disqualified a man from that high dignity, were so many and so frequent, that it is probable, that some of them might be the reason of its passing to Eli, who was of the younger branch; in whose house it continued till Saul's time. After this it shifted once or twice more in David's time, till Solomon, dissatisfied with Abiathar, restored Zadok of the Phinehan family to the first rank again, where it continued to the end. So that Abiathar cannot so properly be said to have been deposed by that prince, as to have been reduced to the pristine rank of his branch (S). Accordingly, we

*† Jerem. c. ult. ver. 24. vide 1 Chron. xxiv. x.

(S) This right was then only so far hereditary, that the high-priesthood always descended to one of the two branches, as long as it was capable of succeeding; if not, one of the next was chosen that was duely qualified. 'Tis true, Moses has not left any written direction about it; but we find that Eli, who was both high-priest and judge in Israel, was not of the family of Eleazar, but of that of Ithamar; for his name is not to be found in the genealogy of the former (38); and Josephus tells us, that he was of the family of the latter (39), and the first of that line that was raised to that high function, and in whose family it continued uninterrupted till Saul's reign.

It were needless to trouble our readers with the various conjectures, that have been made about the reason of this translation, of the high-priesthood from the eldest to the youngest branch; it is enough for us, that it was not done without divine approbation, as appears by what a prophet sent from God said unto Eli (40), to this effect — I chose the house of thy father Aaron, to offer up incense and sacrifice upon my altar ——— Why then do ye kick at my sacrifices ——— Wherefore, tho' I said, that thine house ——— should stand before me for ever ——— Now far be it from me to honour those that dishonour me ——— Lo, the time cometh, that thy sons Hophni and Phinehas shall be cut off in one day ——— and thou shalt behold an enemy in my habitation ——— and I will raise me up a faithful priest ——— Whilst those that are left of thine house shall fall into the utmost poverty and contempt. How and when this prophecy was fulfilled will be seen in its proper place. It is sufficient at present to have given the best light we can get to the manner of his sacred succession. We beg leave only to add, that where the prophet

(38) Vide 1 Chron. vi. 3. & seq. (39) Ant. lib. v. c. ult.
(40) 1 Sam. ii. 27, & seq.

we find him named in the very next chapter but one, after his ſuppoſed depoſition, as ſecond to Zadok. And Zadok and Abiathar were prieſts †. But to return to the high-prieſt: there was ſuch a particular ſacredneſs inherent in his dignity, as obliged him to ſeveral ſtrict laws, from which the reſt of the prieſts were exempt. It was not lawful for him to marry a widow, a repudiated woman, or a harlot; the perſon, whom he took to his bed, was to be a pure virgin, and one of his own tribe. He was forbid to put himſelf into mourning for the neareſt relation, or to go into any houſe where a corps was [c]; he was further obliged to abſtain not only from matrimonial commerce, during thoſe feſtivals in which he was to officiate, but alſo from all food, and other things which might occaſion any defilement. Beſides all theſe, he was, in common with other prieſts, to be free from all natural defects mentioned by Moſes [d]; that is to ſay, that he was to be neither blind, lame, maimed, crooked, or a dwarf; he was to have neither ſcurvy, itch, nor any diſeaſe in his ſkin, or defect in any of his limbs, eſpecially in his teſticles. As many as had any one of theſe blemiſhes, were abſolutely reſcinded from all prieſtly functions, from entering into the ſanctuary, and offering the ſhew-bread; only they were allowed to live upon a portion of the offerings that were made there [e].

2. HIS conſecration. This ceremony was preſcribed by God himſelf on the mount [f], and was performed by Moſes upon his brother Aaron, with a ſolemnity anſwerable to the ſacredneſs of his office. It conſiſted chiefly in the ſix following particulars. 1. And before all things, he was preſented to the Lord at the door of the tabernacle, in the preſence of all the people. 2. He was to waſh himſelf all over in pure water, which was drawn out of a large capacious veſſel, that ſtood near the altar, and was ſet up there for all ſuch purpoſes. 3. He was then immediately inveſted with all the pontifical veſtments, of which we ſhall ſpeak under the next head, and with the breaſt-plate and Urim. 4. His next buſineſs was offering the ſacrifices appointed for this purpoſe; Conſecration.

† Comp. 1 Kings i. 26, 27. and iv. 3. [c] Levit xxi. 10, & ſeq. [d] Ibid. xxi. 16. & ſeq. [e] Ibid. xxi, 22. & ſeq. Exod. xl. 12, & ſeq.

prophet tells Eli, thou ſhalt ſee an enemy in my habitation, the word ſignifies more properly a rival, and ſeems to point directly at the eldeſt branch; which, though ſet aſide for a time, would again be reinſtated in that ſupreme dignity; as it actually was, when Saul cauſed Abimelech to be ſlain, and Zadok to be put in his place.

namely, a bullock for a sin- offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, and another for his consecration; with the blood of which Moses anointed the tip of his right ear, thumb, and great toe, besides the usual aspersions on the altar, and other wave, meat, and drink-offerings. 5. The last ceremony was the anointing of him with the sacred oil, whose composition was likewise prescribed by God [g], and was not to be used for any other purpose. These ceremonies were repeated seven days successively, at least as far as relates to the washing, the sacrifices, and the unction: for it doth not appear, that the ceremony was repeated relating to their putting on the priestly garments [h]. During all this time, Aaron and his sons were not permitted to go out of the tabernacle, but continued there, and feasted themselves with the daily sacrifices which they offered for their consecration; of which no fragment was to be left till the next; morning, but was to be burned that very night. On the eighth day Aaron entered into his office by a double sacrifice one which he offered for himself, and the other for the people, whom he blessed for the first time: and this his inauguration was signalized by the glory of God appearing unto all the people, and by the descent of the holy fire from heaven [i]; which was thence-forwards preserved till the destruction of the first temple, and the use of any other, in the sacred ministry, expresly forbid under pain of death †.

THERE is one thing to be observed in this first consecration; that not only Aaron, but his sons, were consecrated at the same time, and with the same ceremonies, tho' these were to continue still in the rank of common priests. This may be the reason, why Eleazar is afterwards said to have been installed into the high-priesthood, by the sole investiture of his father's garments, without any other ceremony: from which several commentators have concluded, that the rest were not to be used at the installation of any new high-priest. It is true, we can offer nothing conclusive out of the Mosaic text to confute that notion, yet if we believe the antient Jews, who may be properly enough looked upon as the best judges, they will tell us, that the unction did always accompany the investiture till the destruction of the first temple, when Josiah did deposit the sacred oil in so secret a place, that it could never be found out after their return from the Babylonish captivity. From which time, and not till then, they began to con-

[g] Ibid xxx. 22, & seq. pass. vide ver. 23, 24.
[h] Levit, viii. 1. & seq.
[i] Ibid. ix.
† See before p. 1.

tent

tent themſelves with the bare inveſtiture, without the unction [k] (T). However that be, it ſeems reaſonable to think, that Moſes was commanded to conſecrate Aaron's two ſons, Eleazar and Ithamar, at that grand ceremony, as being the two branches unto which the high-prieſthood was confined; as he did at the ſame time all the prieſtly garments, the tabernacle, [k] Vide SELD. de Succeſſion. ad Pontificat. lib. ii. c. 9. BASNAG. Rep. Heb. tom. i. lib. 2. c. 7.

(T) The rabbies add, that thoſe that were conſecrated by unction were called anointed, and the others only inveſted; and that they did never venture to make a new compoſition of the ſacred ointment, after that of Moſes was gone (41). But we can ſee no reaſon for joining with them, becauſe Moſes was ſo far from forbidding any ſuch thing, that he has left a plain receipt how to make it. It is certain, that many antient fathers believed, that it continued till the time of Chriſt (42); and Zechariah, ſpeaking of his viſion of the two high-prieſts, Joſhua and Zerubbabel, calls them בְּנֵי הַיִּצְהָר, Bene Hajizhar, the ſons of oil or unction (43): which Kimchi renders, rightly enough, anointed; becauſe, ſays he, Joſhua was anointed high-prieſt, and Zerubbabel king (44). We may add an adage of the Gemarriſts concerning the דִּין יְרוּשָּׁה, Din Jeruſhah, or hereditary right; about which they make this diſtinction, that an high-prieſt, the ſon of an high prieſt, muſt be anointed, becauſe that right is not abſolutely in him; but the ſon of an anointed king needs not be anointed, becauſe it is in him. Abarbanel adds, in his comment upon the place, that it was the judgment of their wiſe-men to chooſe him for high prieſt מֵאֲחָיו, from among his brethren, that was גָּדוֹל בָּנוּי גָּדוֹל בְּעוֹשֶׁר וּגְדוֹל בְּכֹחַ the moſt beautiful, the richeſt, and ſtrongeſt; who was therefore to be anointed, that the reſt might thereby know, that he was duely choſen from the midſt of his brethren (45).

How this anointing was performed, is not very clear (46); but, by the expreſſion of the pſalmiſt (47), as well as that which Zechariah makes uſe of here, it ſeems to have been performed by pouring the oil upon the head ſo plentifully, that it ran down to his beard, and thence upon the ſkirts of his garment. The rabbies are of that opinion, only ſome ſay, that it was poured in form of an X, others in that of a כ Caph; but theſe are not worth dwelling upon (48).

(41) Vide Seld. de Succeſ. ubi ſup. (42) Euſeb. Demonſt. Ev. lib. iv. c. 4. Chryſoſt. Orat. 2. cont. Judæos. Cyril. Jeroſ. Myſtag. cont. Jud. Anaſt. de incarnat. verb. vide & Calm. ſub voc. unction (43) Ch. iv. ver. ult. vide Munſt. in loc. (44) Vide Abarb. & Munſt. in Zechar. ubi ſup. (45) Abarban. Comm. in gemar. in loc. (46) Vide Goodwin's Moſes & Aaron. lib i. c. 5. note 1. (47) Pſ. cxxxiii. 2. (48) Vide Toſtat, Janſen. Menoch.

and

and all the ſacred utenſils of it; which were to be entirely conſecrated to the ſervice of God for ever after [l].

His dreſs. 3. HIS prieſtly veſtments. And all that we can with any certainty advance concerning theſe is, that they were likewiſe preſcribed by God himſelf, and that they conſiſted of every thing that could make them truly rich, ſumptuous, and venerable; ſuch as a great variety of precious ſtones, gold, ſilver, purple, ſcarlet, the fineſt of ſilk, linen, and the like: but as to the faſhion of them, all that has been advanced about it, tho' with never ſo poſitive an air, is all mere conjecture; becauſe Moſes has contented himſelf with giving us the names of them, without any further deſcription, as being altogether needleſs. Joſephus has indeed been more particular in this reſpect [m]: but all we can depend upon him for is, that he has deſcribed them as they were worn in his time; and how far the faſhion of them might have altered during ſo long a ſpace, and ſuch a variety of circumſtances which the Jewiſh common-wealth went through, is not eaſy to gueſs. The rabbies have deſcribed them vaſtly different from him, and St. Jerom deſcribes ſome of them differently from theſe too [n]. So that we may truly ſay, that thoſe moderns, who have lately given us ſuch lively deſcriptions of them, both in writing and in various prints, have rather furniſhed the world with new models for maſquerading habits, than informed us with any thing, either certain or indeed material. This caution being premiſed, we ſhall now endeavour to give our readers the beſt account we can of them, with any tolerable certainty, and refer the reader to Joſephus and thoſe modern authors, who have treated more fully of them *.

THEY were of two ſorts, the one made of linen, and common to him and all the other prieſts; and if there was any difference between them, it was in the former being made of finer linen, and woven in a richer manner. We have already mentioned them under the head of expiation, they being the only ones, that he is ſuppoſed to have wore when he went into the holy of holies. Only one would be apt to think, that theſe were made of a finer linen, becauſe they are called by another name; namely, Sheſh, which is thought a fine Egyptian ſort, whereas that which is called Bad is a more common one. Theſe were the mitre, or turban, long robe, or veſt, his drawers, and his girdle. The others, [l] Vide Levit. viii. 10, & ſeq. ad 30, ix. paſſ. vide & verſ. 23, & 24. [m] Ant. lib. iii. c. 7. [n] HIERON. ad Fabiol.

* Ant. lib. iii. c. 7. CUNÆUS, BASNAG. LAMY, CALMET. & al.

which

which were peculiar to him, and which he was to wear upon all ſolemn days and occaſions, were ſo rich and magnificent, that the Jews called them Bagde Zahab, veſtures of gold, to expreſs the richneſs of them ; and Moſes, the glory and ornament of Aaron [o]. The firſt was a blue or purple robe, which he put on over his linen veſt (V). This garment had no

[o] Exod. xxviii. 2.

(V) We have no great certainty above theſe colours, eſpecially the blue. The Greek and old verſions render the word תכלת, Tekeleth, by Hyacinth, but as there is a ſtone of that name, which is of a yellow, and a flower of a light blue, or purpliſh colour, it is not eaſy to know to which of thoſe the interpreters alluded. The old Flemiſh verſion, among ſome others, renders it yellow ſilk ; but as that colour, when mixed with ſcarlet and purple is too glaring, eſpecially where there is ſo great a mixture of gold, the generality of interpreters think it to be the colour of the flower ſo called. As for the ארגמן, Argaman, which we tranſlate purple, it is moſt likely to have been a dye, made of the blood of a ſhell-fiſh of that name, which was caught upon the coaſts of Paleſtine, and for which the Tyrians came to be ſo famous. Some Jewiſh etymologiſts make Argaman to be a kind of adjective of the word רגם, Regem, which according to them ſignifies a prince or royal perſon ; for which reaſon they chooſe to tranſlate it a princely colour, ſuch as the kings wore themſelves, and cloathed their greateſt favourites with. Thus Daniel was cloathed in purple by Belſhazzar (49) ; and Chriſt with a robe of mockery of the ſame colour (50).

Neither are we much more certain concerning the Hebrew words בד, bad, שש, ſheſh, פשתה, piſhtah, and בוץ, buzz ; whence the byſſus ; that is, whether they all ſignify linen made of flax or hemp, differing only in degrees of fineneſs, or weaving ; or whether the ſheſh was not either a kind of cotton or ſilk. There is no reaſon to doubt but theſe were both uſed and eſteemed at that time ; and as the prieſtly robes were to be made of the moſt coſtly things, it is not improbable, but theſe went into the compoſition under one of the three firſt names. As to the buzz, by which interpreters commonly underſtand the fineſt of Egyptian linen, it is moſt likely to have been a ſilk, made of the tail of a fiſh †. But this laſt is not to be met with in the Moſaic writings. The laſt quoted author has at leaſt made it probable, that the ſheſh was a kind of fine cotton ‡; and as for what the Jews ſay, that there could be no

(49) Dan. v. 29. (50) John xix 5. † Baſil in Hexamer. Procop. de Fabric. ap. Calmet Comment. in Exod. & Paralipom. ‡ Idem Comm. in Exod & Dict jud. voc. Cotton.

no ſleeves, or any ſeam, according to Joſephus, being woven, like that of our Saviour's, from top to bottom, with a ſlit to put his head through. The border of it, which reached almoſt to his ancles, was trimmed with a rich fringe; to which were interchangeably hung little bells, and pomegranates curiouſly wrought in pure gold, at equal diſtance one from another, that by their tinkling his approach might be the more eaſily diſtinguiſhed. This veſt was tied round with a rich girdle, which went twice round his body, and hung down a convenient length before him.

OVER this veſt was a third, called the ephod, curiouſly wrought with gold and other variegated embroidery, not unlike a ſhort coat, about two foot in length. On the top of it, on each ſide, were two ſhoulder-pieces; to which were faſtened two precious ſtones (W) ſet in gold; on which were engraved the names of the twelve tribes, ſix upon each ſtone, that he might always have before his eyes thoſe that were committed to his paſtoral care. Upon the breaſt of it was a vacancy of about half a cubit in length, and a proportionable breadth, on which the breaſt-plate was to be faſtened. This was a folded piece of the ſame rich embroidered tiſſue, on no linen thread mixed in theſe garbs, becauſe it was contrary to the law, which forbids the mixture of linſey-woolſey *. It is probable, as Cunæus obſerves, that it related only to ſtuffs made for common wear or uſe; and to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe that were for ſacred purpoſes, ſuch as the curtains, &c. of the tabernacle, and the robes of the high-prieſt; which were made of every thing that was ſplendid and coſtly

(W) The word in the original is שֹׁהַם, ſhoham, which our verſion, after ſeveral others antient and modern, tranſlates onyx-ſtone, though the Septuagint and ſome others think, it ſignifies the emerald. The truth is, that all the light we can get from commentators, whether Jewiſh or Chriſtian, antient or modern, is too dim to lead us to the certain knowledge either of this, or any other of the twelve ſtones of the breaſt-plate; becauſe it is hardly poſſible, for any of them to have been ſufficiently acquainted with their true ſignification. And this is the reaſon, why we find ſo little agreement among them. However, as the thing is of no great conſequence, we ſhall follow our Engliſh verſion, which for ought appears to the contrary, may have gueſſed as right as any other. Thoſe who are curious in ſuch things may, if they pleaſe, conſult thoſe authors quoted in the margin (51), who have wrote about them ex profeſſo.

* Levit. xix. 19. Deut. xxii. 11. (51) Vide Commentat. in Gen. ii. 12. Lud. de Dieu, in Exod. xxviii. 17, & ſeq Brannius de Veſt. S. Sacred. Heb. Fra. Dell. Strad. de Gemmis, & al.

which were faſtened twelve precious ſtones, ſet in gold, on each of which was engraven the name of one of the tribes. Theſe were ſet in four rows, three in each row (X), and the whole was faſtened at the four corners; thoſe on the top to each ſhoulder-piece by a golden hook or ring, at the end of a wreathed chain; and thoſe below to the girdle of the ephod, by two blue ſtrings or ribbons, which had likewiſe two rings

(X) Theſe were divided one from another by the little golden partitions, into which they were ſet, and were diſpoſed in the following order: to which we have added their Hebrew names, together with the tribe that was engraven upon each of them (52).

1. אדם Odem	Sardius Reuben	2. פסרה Phiterah	Topaz Simeon	3. ברקת Barketh	Carbuncle Levi
4. נפך Nophek	Emerald Judah	5 ספיר Saphire	Saphire Dan	6. יהלום Jahalom	Diamond Naphtali
7. לשם Leſhem	Ligure Gad	8. שבו Shebo	Agate Aſher	9. אחלמה Achlamah	Amethyſt Iſſachar
10. תרשיש Tarſhiſh	Beryl Zebulun	11. שוהם Shohem	Onyx Joſeph	12. ישפה Yaſhphe	Jaſper Benjamin.

Some of theſe ſtones, it muſt be owned, are of ſo hard a nature, eſpecially the diamond, that one may juſtly queſtion, how they came ſo ſoon by the art of engraving on them. But here the Talmudiſts wonderfully help us out, by aſſuring us, that they were not engraven by any tool, which would have waſted ſome part of the ſtone, but by a miraculous worm, not now in being; which, being ſet upon each of theſe ſtones, did ſink itſelf all along thoſe places which Moſes had chalked to it, and ſo impreſſed the letters into the ſtones, in the ſame manner as we might do into ſome things of a ſoft and yielding ſubſtance, without taking off any part of it. They relate likewiſe ſeveral other wonders about this worm and theſe precious ſtones, which we ſhall not trouble our readers with, after what we have owned in the laſt note, concerning the little certainty we can have, from any good authority, of even the true ſignification of their names. The Jews, among other things, tell us, that the names of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, were engraven alſo over the name of Reuben, in the firſt ſtone; and in the laſt, under that of Benjamin, the words, שבטי יה, Shibte jah, the tribes of the Lord, in order to make up the whole alphabet: ſome letters of which were wanting in the names of the twelve patriarchs (53). But this is only to confirm an hypotheſis of theirs, that the divine oracle was known by the protuberance or ſuperior luſtre of ſuch letters as compoſed the anſwer. But of this we have already ſpoken in another place †.

(52) Exod. xxviii. 17. & ſeq. (53) Maimon, Kele bammikdaſh c. 9. † ee before p 30. note (C).

and hooks; so that the whole might be tied fast to the garment; beyond the danger of falling off. For these were never to be severed; and the Jews tell us, that if the high-priest did at any time, either through inadvertency or wilfully, put on the one without the other, he was to be punished for it. This ornament is therefore called the memorial, to put him in mind how dear those tribes ought to be to him, whose names he wore over his breast. It is also called the breast-plate of judgment, because it had the divine oracle fastened to it. At least the far greater part of interpreters have understood the command of God to Moses, of putting the Urim and Thummim to the breast-plate [p], as if it implied them to be a distinct thing from it; and this has made them run into various notions, as we shall shew presently.

WHAT this oracle consisted in, and how it was consulted, we have seen in a former section †; and have now nothing left to inquire about, but its form and make. But here we are also left so much in the dark, that it would require a new Urim and Thummim to acquaint us with it; because no inspired writer has given us any hint, and those who have since wrote their conjectures about it, seem to have given so great a scope to their fancy, that one shall scarce find two or three of them agreeing in the same notion. Some antients thought, that there was a thirteenth stone in the breast-plate, whose extraordinary lustre and beauty above the rest, did signify to the high-priest, God's approbation or dislike of the thing inquired about [q]. And though St. Austin has plainly proved, that there was not the least foundation for such a supernumerary stone [r], some moderns have not scrupled to add another, in order to answer the two names of Urim and Thummim [s]. An antient father, who is followed by a great many moderns, thinks, that those two words were either engraven on a plate of gold and fixed to the breast-plate, or embroidered in raised work upon it [t]. Most of the Jews believe, that it was the Tetragrammaton written upon a plate of gold, or some other way fixed to the breast-plate [u]; and Le Clerc, that Urim and Thummim were the names of two kinds of precious stones, set in a gold chain or collar, which were hung about the high-priest's neck, and came down to his breast; probably, as he thinks, in imitation of the Egyptians, whose chief magistrate wore a gold chain, at the end of which hung the figures of justice and truth engraven on ſome precious ſtone [w]. A modern traveller, in a letter dated from Cairo, tells us, that he ſaw a very antient mummy in Egypt, which had a large collar hanging down to its breaſt, with a bird engraven in gold faſtened to the end of it [x]. Spencer, after De Caſtro, believed, that the breaſt-plate had two little golden figures, encloſed in a kind of purſe, which did give anſwers vivâ voce, to the queſtions of the high-prieſt [y]; and for this he quotes St. Jerom and Cedrenus among the antients, Cornelius a Lapide and Ludovicus de Dieu among the moderns, with ſome Jewiſh writers: but this notion has been ſo ſeverely anſwered by the learned Pocock *, as abſurd and impious, that we know not of its having been embraced by any author ſince. Philo indeed ſeems to hint ſomething like it [z], only with this difference, that he ſays, thoſe two figures, or virtues, namely manifeſtation and truth, were only embroidered upon it: and it muſt be owned, that if there were any ſuch figures or ſymbols, it is more reaſonable to ſuppoſe them, with him, to have been only embroidered, than with Spencer, that they were real figures, whether caſt or carved by any other way; becauſe this latter ſeems too contrary to the prohibition in the ſecond Commandment (Y). But we ſee no need of ſuppoſing any ſuch figures, upon the authority of either; becauſe Joſephus, who was alſo a prieſt, and may be reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been as well acquainted with it as Philo, doth not ſo much as

[p] Exod. xxviii. 30. † See before p. 30. note (C). [q] EPIPHAN. Tract. de XII. Gemmis. Suidas, in Εφοδ. [r] Quest. in Exod. 117. [s] ARR. MONT. & al. [t] CYRIL. Exposit. Symbol. [u] Ita Rabbin. vide R. SALOM. vide EGUB. & MUNST. in loc.

and

[w] Com. in loc. vide DIOD. SICUL. lib. ii. c. 3. Biblioth. ÆLIAN. Var. Hiſt. & al. [x] PET. VALLA, Epiſt. xi. [y] Diſſert. de Ur. & Thum. * Comm. in Hoſ. iii. 4. [z] In vit. Moſ. lib. iii. de Monarc. l. ii.

(Y) If it ſhould be objected here, that the cherubims in the ſanctuary were as contrary to that prohibition, as theſe ſuppoſed figures; we beg leave to obſerve, that there was not the leaſt danger of the former being miſtaken for a ſymbol of the deity, even by the moſt ſtupid, becauſe God is expreſly ſaid in ſeveral places to dwell between the cherubims; ſo that they could only look upon them as ornaments to the mercy-ſeat, or at moſt, as ſymbols of thoſe heavenly beings, who continually adore and praiſe him, and fly with the utmoſt ſpeed to perform his commands. And this ſeems to be the reaſon of the humble poſture in which they were repreſented, and of their having ſo many wings. We cannot ſay the ſame of the latter, becauſe their delivering the divine oracles in any way, but more eſpecially if they had done it vivâ voce, as our author pretends, could hardly have failed of inſpiring the people with the ſame idolatrous notions, that the reſt of the Heathen entertained concerning their falſe deities.

hint any thing like ſuch figures, but makes the oracle to conſiſt in the ſupernatural brightneſs of the twelve ſtones at the time of inquiring, as we have ſeen already; and as for Spencer, it is plain, that he is too fond of fetching the origin of every thing from Egypt. Sure it is, that whoever compares the places, where Moſes mentions the Urim and Thummim [a], will have reaſon to wonder, that God, who took ſuch particular care to give him the moſt exact directions for all the other garments, utenſils, &c. ſhould not give him the leaſt hint about theſe; unleſs we do ſuppoſe them to have been things ſufficiently both known to him and to all the people. If therefore we might be permitted to prefer one opinion to all the reſt, it would be that of the judicious Hottinger; who thinks, that when Moſes is commanded to put into the breaſt-plate the Urim and Thummim, which words, as has been ſhewn already, do ſignify light and perfection in the plural, it means only, that he ſhould make choice of the moſt perfect ſet of ſtones, and have them poliſhed, ſo as to give the moſt conſummate luſtre [b] (Z). And this ſeems moſt agreeable to what Joſephus and Maimon ſaid of it, except the miraculous luſtre which the former attributes to them, in order to account for the oracle; concerning which we have elſewhere offered a more probable conjecture †. However we are far from diſapproving of that more ſpiritual notion of the learned Pri-

[a] Exod. xxviii. 30. Deut. xxxiii. 8. & Levit. viii. 8. [b] In Moſ. & Aar. lib i. c. 5. note 11. † See before p. 30. note (C).

(Z) This conjecture is ſo far from jarring with the literal ſenſe of the original, that the very expreſſion, which Moſes makes uſe of in the places above quoted (54), ſeems to lead one to it. For after God had given him all the particular directions for making the breaſt-plate, ſuch as the length and breadth, the materials, the precious ſtones, &c. even to the hooks, rings, chains, and ſtrings, by which it was to be made faſt to the ephod; he adds, ונתת אל חושן המשפת את האורים ואה התימים which literally runs thus; and thou ſhalt give to the breaſt plate of judgment theſe lights or luſtres and perfections; namely of the twelve ſtones before deſcribed. We need not to add, that according to the Hebrew idiom the word אור, or light, doth often imply the brightneſs, and תום, thom, the goodneſs of a thing in its kind, and that the plural number, as here, is often uſed to expreſs the higheſt degree of it. However, we leave it to the reader to adopt which of all theſe ſeems moſt probable to him, and if he is deſirous to know more about this point, he may conſult the learned Buxtorf the younger, who has almoſt exhauſted the ſubject (55).

(54) Sub lit. a. (55) Exercit. iii. de Ur. & Thum.

deaux;

deaux; who believes that thoſe two words were choſen, to expreſs the clearneſs and certainty of the oracle, by a particular divine virtue communicated to the breaſt-plate at its conſecration; only we are more inclined to ſuppoſe, that this latter ſenſe was emblematically ſignified by the genuineneſs and brightneſs of the ſtones. At leaſt we find that the Jews, immediately after their return from the captivity, thought it neceſſary to imitate this breaſt-plate in all its parts, and to call it by the ſame name, tho' they own, that it had not the oracular virtue of the former [c]. Now it is plain, that ſuch an imitation would have been ridiculous, if not impious, upon any other ſuppoſition, than that they underſtood the words Urim and Thummim, to have been deſigned by God, not as abſolutely expreſſive, but as ſymbolical, of the light and clearneſs of this oracle.

THE laſt garment peculiar to the high-prieſt was his mitre or bonnet. Whether, and how far it differed in faſhion from that of the common prieſts, Moſes doth not tell us, neither is it eaſy to gueſs, tho' their being called by different names, and made at leaſt of different kinds of linen (A), inclines one to think, that there was ſome conſiderable difference between them; if not in ſhape, yet in beauty and richneſs. The reader may ſee, in the next note, all that can be conjectured

[c] Vide MAIM. Kele hammikdaſh, cap. x. § 10.

(A) As to the names, that of the high-prieſt is called מִצְנֶפֶת, Mizncpheth, from which the boldeſt etymologiſts, that we know of, have not ventured to draw any hint about its make. It is not ſo with thoſe of the common prieſts, which being called מִגְבָּעוֹת, Miggbaghoth, they conclude, were higher than the former, becauſe גִּבְעָה, ſignifies a hill (56). Though the word, being in the plural, would rather incline one to believe, that there were ſome partitions in thoſe prominences, like unto the mitres worn in the church of Rome: but the learned Abraham Ben David has rejected that notion in his obſervations on Maimon, and maintains, that the high-prieſt's mitre was higher than all the reſt. We ſhall not take upon us to ſay which of theſe is moſt in the right.

Another difference marked by Moſes is, that that of the high-prieſt was made of שֵׁשׁ, ſheſh, and that of the prieſts of בַּד, bad. We have already taken notice, that the former was, if not a ſilk or fine cotton, yet at leaſt a finer ſort of linen than the latter (57).

(56) Maimon. ubi ſup. c. viii. § 19. (57) Vide Calm. ſub voc. Cotton.

concerning

concerning it (B), from Jewish and Christian authors; however the pontifical one was remarkably distinguished from the common, by the golden plate on which were engraven in Hebrew the words, HOLINESS TO THE LORD [d]. This plate is also called in some other places a crown [e], and was fastened to the fore-part of the mitre, by two blue ribbons or strings.

THESE words, the Jews tell us, were raised by a kind of enamel above the gold [f]: but this seems contrary to the meaning of Moses's words; who expressly says, that they were to be written, like the engraving of a signet. However there is no doubt, but it was designed to express the holiness of the character of the person that wore it: which was to be such,

[d] Exod. xxviii. 36. [e] Exod. xxix. 6. xxxix. 30. Levit. viii. 9.
[f] MAIM. ubi sup. c. ix. § 1.

(B) All that we can gather from Josephus, St. Jerom, Maimon (58), and others concerning this ornament is, that it was a kind of cap not unlike a hemisphere, which consequently did not come down lower than the ears, and was wrapped several times about with a piece of fine cotton or linen, of a considerable length, and tied behind the head with a blue ribbon or string, to prevent its falling of. Josephus adds, that the mitre was covered with another, of fine blue or purple, having a triple crown of gold about it, and that on the top, just in the middle, it had a kind of golden cup turned upwards, resembling the bud of a plant, which he is there very particular in describing. But we shall refer the reader to the author. The Jews further add, that as the crown or plate of gold did go but half way round the head, the other, that is, the hinder part, was filled up with artificial flowers or festoons to the place where it was tied. Both the high-priest and the inferior ones were very careful to tie their bonnets fast, when they officiated; because it was thought a mark of reverence to appear with the head covered, and of irreverence and boldness to be seen bare-headed; according to which notion the Chaldee paraphrast renders those places, where the Israelites are said to have marched out of Egypt, with a high hand (59), by the words bare-headed, that is, with boldness, and intrepidity. On the contrary, the greatest token of respect with them was to be bare-foot; and this is the reason why we find no mention of shoes or sandals among the priestly robes, they being all obliged to perform their office bare-foot; and in this they became so scrupulous, that if they perceived any thing, tho' but a straw, between their feet and the ground, they were obliged to remove it, or else their ministry was esteemed null.

(58) Jos. Ant. lib. iii. c. 7. Hieron. ad Fabiol. Maim. Kele Lammikdash. c. ix. § 10. (59) Exod. xiv. 8, & alib.

that

that the leaſt defilement, tho' never ſo involuntary, diſqualified him from performing his office, till he had been legally purified from it. Concerning this point, the Jews acquaint us with a particularity, which, tho' not mentioned by Moſes, is well worth inſerting here, as having no ſmall probability. They tell us out of their Talmud [g], that on expiation-day, the high-prieſt being to perform the ſervice of that ſolemn faſt, and it being far from impoſſible, that he might contract ſome impurity, which might unfit him for his office, notwithſtanding all his care and caution, they uſed, on the eve of it, to appoint him a vicar to officiate for him, in caſe of ſuch a defilement. This vicar was neither anointed nor conſecrated for the place, tho' his new office did oblige him to go into the moſt holy place inſtead of him. They add, that as ſoon as the one was cleanſed, he re-entered into his office; and the other relinquiſhed it, and returned into the rank of common prieſts, only with this difference, that he had ſome kind of ſuperiority and rule over the reſt; and if the high-prieſt died before him, he ſucceeded him in that dignity of courſe. Joſephus confirms this by the inſtance of the high-prieſt Matthias, who, having defiled himſelf by a dream, on the night preceding the expiation, Joſeph, the ſon of Eli, a near relation of his, officiated for him [h]. Maimon calls this vicar Sagon; and adds, that he had two prieſts to wait upon him, as he himſelf waited on the high-prieſt; with ſome other particulars which we ſhall not dwell upon, becauſe they appear of later inſtitution [i] (C). However, with reſpect to the high-prieſt, it is plain, that he might be ſullied ſo many [g] Idem in Maſſec. in Yoma. [h] Ant. lib. xvii. c. 8. [i] Vide MAIM. Kele hammikdaſh.

(C) The truth is, that after the Babyloniſh captivity, when they became more ſcrupulous obſervers of the law, their prieſts and wiſe men made abundance of ordinances, for keeping a ſtricter diſcipline; even to the adminiſtring a ſolemn oath to the high-prieſt on the eve of expiation, that he would exactly conform to the Moſaic injunctions, according to the traditions then received. This caution became highly neceſſary, not only after the high prieſthood became venable, and the purchaſers leſs ſcrupulous about the functions of it, but alſo by reaſon of ſome difference in opinions, about the burning of incenſe in the holy of holies, the ſcape-goat, and ſome other things; concerning which the reader may conſult Ben Maimon (60).

(60) Halaka havodath yom hakepburim, c. 1. Vide Baſnag in Cun. lib. ii. c. 6.

unforeſeen ways, and ran ſuch risk, if he entered the moſt holy place with any ſuch pollution, that it is more than probable, there was ſome perſon appointed by way of precaution to perform his office in all ſuch caſes. But who this ſubſtitute was, how, and by whom, he was appointed, we dare not affirm; though it is not improbable, that he might be the head of the other branch, which, as we obſerved at firſt, did hold the next rank to him; and is therefore moſt likely to be the perſon meant in the laſt chapter of Jeremiah, where it is ſaid, that the captain of the guard took Seraiah the high, and Zephaniah the ſecond prieſt *. In this ſenſe likewiſe it is thought by many of the learned, that Annas and Caiaphas are ſaid, by St. Luke † to be high-prieſts in the ſame year; but, concerning the perſon that named him, or the ceremony by which he was qualified for it, Moſes has left no written direction, any more than about the choice of a ſucceſſor to the pontifical dignity, when the next immediate heir was unfit for it.

Laws concerning the prieſts.

Laws concerning prieſts. WE have already taken notice, that theſe were deſcended from Aaron the firſt high-prieſt, by his two ſons Eleazar and Ithamar. Moſes, indeed, mentions only theſe two, as being the heads of the two main branches of the prieſthood; but it were abſurd to ſuppoſe from thence, that they were the only two that officiated under their father; for we find that Phinehas was already come to years of manhood, by that zeal which he ſhewed againſt the Midianitiſh defection [k]; and probably there were more of age ſufficient to perform the prieſtly functions. Theſe, being ſubordinate to the high-prieſt, and of a rank and office ſuperior to the Levites, may be conſidered in a threefold view; namely, with regard to their conſecration, office, and dreſs. But of theſe we ſhall not need ſay much, becauſe there was nothing of pomp or ſolemnity uſed in any of them.

Their conſecration. THEIR conſecration, if we except that of the ſons of Aaron, which we mentioned in a former article, was performed with little or no ceremony. They were firſt carefully examined, whether they were free from all natural defects

* Ver. 24 † Luke iii. 2. Vide CAUSAUB. adver. Baron. Jos. SCALIGER. proleg. in EUSEB HOTTING. in GOODWIN's Moſ. & Aar. lib. 1. c. 5. ſub. not. 19, & al. [k] Num xxv. 7 & ſeq.

and

and impurities (D), and if ſo, they were introduced into the court of the tabernacle or temple, where they waſhed themſelves with pure water preſerved there for that purpoſe; after which, being cloathed in their prieſtly habit, they were brought to the high-prieſt, who preſented them to the Lord; and after the uſual ſacrifices preſcribed by Moſes, that pontif, or the prieſt in waiting, ſanctified them, or, as the original imports filled their hands, by which is underſtood their being immediately ſet about ſome branch of the prieſtly office. At leaſt theſe ceremonies are inferred from thoſe of the conſe-

(D) Theſe were the ſame as unqualified the high-prieſt, and are mentioned under that head out of Leviticus (61); but the Jews tell us, that theſe are but a ſketch of thoſe that exclude from the prieſtly functions, which they have enlarged at a very ſtrange rate. We ſhall juſt mention the heads of them. They reckoned eight of them belonging to the head, nineteen to the eyes, five to the eye-lids, ſeven to the eye-brows, nine to the ears, as many to the noſe, ſix to the mouth, three to the lips, two to the neck, three to the belly, three to the back, ſixteen to the genitals, twelve to the joints of the hands and feet, eight to the ſkin and fleſh, and at leaſt leven to the upper ſkin (62).

Beſides theſe, which unqualified a man, either from being admitted to the prieſtly office, or from being continued in it, if he contracted them after his admittance, there were ſeveral other voluntary ones for which he was ſet aſide from the miniſtry, either for a time, or for his life. Of the firſt kind were ſeveral legal pollutions, the greateſt of which was that of a dead body. For this reaſon they were not allowed to aſſiſt at the funeral of any but the neareſt relations, that is, a father or mother, and a brother or ſiſter that died virgins. In all ſuch pollutions they were forbid not only to perform any ſacerdotal office, but even to eat of holy things, till they had thoroughly purified themſelves, according to the law (63). Thoſe that excluded them wholly from the prieſthood, beſides the natural and accidental ones above-mentioned, were, for inſtance, unlawful marriages, that is, the marrying of a harlot, or a Canaanitiſh, or any ſtrange woman, and refuſing to put her away. Something like this we find practiſed in the time of Ezra (64), after the captivity; to which we may add, that of the prophet (65), that they were even forbid to marry the widow of any but a prieſt. Idolatry likewiſe, and many other crimes of that high nature, did wholly exclude a perſon from the prieſthood (66).

(61) Ch. xxi. 18. & ſeq. (62) Vide Maim. in Biath hammikd. ch. 8. Baſnag ubi ſup. tom. iii. lib. 2. c. 4. (63) Lev. xxii. 6, & ſeq. (64) Ezr. x. 10, & ſeq. (65) Ezek. xliv. 22. vide & Levit. xxi. 13. (66) Vide Maim. ביאת המקדש, c. i.

 ceration

cration of the Levites [l]; for as these were of an inferior rank, it is reasonable to suppose, that the priests could not be consecrated with less ceremony; but even here it is very much questioned, whether any of these, except only the two or three first, were ever yet used, unless in cases of some signal defection, or long disuse of their office and the like, such as frequently happened during the reigns of some of their wicked kings [m].

THEIR office, which was severally determined by lot, and which they did cast at their first coming into waiting, was either to burn incense morning and evening in the holy place, or to offer up the daily sacrifice; to kill, dress, and offer up the victims proper for the day, to pour the blood at the foot of the altar; to keep up a continual fire upon the altar of burnt-offerings; to light the lamps, and to make and offer the shew-bread upon the golden table; with some others of the like nature, the most material of which we have had occasion to mention under the articles of sacrifices, first-fruits, purifications, and the like. Their waiting was weekly from sabbath to sabbath, and quarterly according to their classes; the age in which they were to begin to minister, was fixed by Moses at about twenty five or thirty years of age, and ended about fifty [n]; but in David's time they were made to serve from the age of twenty [o]. Those who either by age or infirmity were disabled from ministring, were maintained by the offerings of the altar, and other perquisites of the priesthood; and any Levite that willingly offered himself to serve in the temple all his days, was admitted to the like maintenance [p], as we shall see in its place: other more important parts of the priestly office were the instruction of the people [q], judging of controversies [r], of leprosy and other pollutions [s], causes of divorce, and the use of the water of jealousy [t]; of vows, and of the fitness or unfitness of victims; blowing the trumpets, in order to proclaim the sabbath and solemn feasts, the calling of assemblies; sounding to war; encouraging of the combatants, and others of the like nature, which have been occasionally spoken of already. But the most sacred part of their function was the bearing of the ark, preserving of the volumes of the law, and blessing of the people in GOD's name [u]. There were likewise some severe [l] Numb. viii. 5. & seq. [m] Vide 2 Kings ii. 5, 7. [n] Num. iv. 3 viii. 24. [o] 1 Chron. xxiii. 24. 2 Chron. xxxi. 17. [p] Deut xviii, 6. [q] Lev. x. 11. Malach. ii. 7. [r] Deut. xvii. 8, & seq xix. 17, & alib. [s] Lev. xiii. xiv. & xv. pass. & alib. [t] Numb. v. 12, & seq. [u] Num. vi. 23, & seq.

inhibitions

inhibitions relating to their office, ſome of which were explicit, and ſome implicit. Of the firſt ſort were thoſe which forbad them to make uſe of any ſtrange fire [w], of drinking either wine or any intoxicating liquors, when they came to miniſter [x] (E). They were likewiſe forbid to begin any ſacerdotal function till they had firſt waſhed their hands and feet [y]. The implicit ones were ſuch as theſe not to appear in the miniſtry without their prieſtly garments, or with any rent in their cloaths, becauſe they were tokens of mourning; or with their hair grown to too great a length, or their heads uncovered. To theſe the Talmudiſts have added ſome others, ſuch as ſitting down whilſt they performed any part of their office (F); making uſe of the left hand inſtead of the right (becauſe Aaron and his ſons had their right ears, thumbs, and great toes ſanctified by the blood of the victims); and others of leſs conſequence [z].

IN David's time the two families of Eleazar and Ithamar were, for better order's ſake, divided into twenty four claſſes, according to the number of each family; ſo that the former, being the more numerous, was divided into ſixteen, [w] Lev. x. 1. [x] Ibid. ver. 9. [y] Exod. xxx. 21, [z] Vide MAIM. Biath. Hammickdaſh, c. 1. & ſeq. BASNAG. R. H. tom. iii. lib. ii. c. 4.

(E) The reaſon of this prohibition we have hinted at heretofore † ; but as expreſs and plain as it is, the Jewiſh doctors have ſubtiliſed a conſiderable part of it away, and thereby fruſtrated its main deſign, by diſtinguiſhing between wine under or above forty days old; between the latter and other ſtrong drink; between drinking the quantity of a quarter of a pint, at one or at ſeveral draughts, and the like (67). Sure it is, that this prohibition was intended to prevent all kind of blunders and indecencies in God's ſervice: whereas it is plain, that a prieſt might drink enough to endanger his being guilty of them, and yet be deemed guiltleſs, or at the worſt come off with a baſtinado, by theſe nice diſtinctions.

(F) Some of their rabbies have indeed been more remiſs, and allowed them to ſit down, when they were not in the actual performance of their office; but the Talmudiſts are ſo far from ſuch an indulgence, that they would not permit them to ſit, or to be in any other than a ſtanding poſture, even whilſt they waſhed their feet. And this they inferred from the words of Moſes, the Lord hath choſen them to ſtand to miniſter, &c. (68).

† See before p. 1. (67) Maim. ubi ſup. (68) Deut. xviii. 5. 7. & alib. Vide Chryſoſt. ad Hebr. x. 11. Maim. ubi ſup. c. 5. R. Sal. Jark. in Deut. xviii. & al.

and the latter into eight classes. These took their turns in the ministry, according as it was assigned to them by lot, which was commonly cast before the king, high-priest, and other persons of distinction, to avoid fraud and confusion: an account of which the reader will find in the twenty fourth chapter of the first book of the Chronicles. All that we shall add is, that these classes took their names from their heads or chiefs, and continued to be called by them to the end of that commonwealth, and from this the heads of each class came afterwards to be called chief-priests. This is the reason why we meet in two of the evangelists †, with an assembly of them, which ought therefore to be distinguished both from the high-priest and from his suffragan.

Dress. We have already said something of their dress when we spoke of that of the high-priest going to the holy of holies. It consisted of a vest, a pair of drawers, a girdle, and a mitre or cap, all of linen. The cap resembled, according to Josephus, and those who follow him, a helmet or pointed turban. Their girdle was variegated with the finest colours, about three finger's-breadth, and woven round like an eel-skin. Their vest or long coat, it is pretended, was without seam woven from top to bottom, and with the sleeves to it. Some of those authors have ventured to give us the print of a loom or frame for making such kind of garments [a]. No priest was to wear his hair to its full length, but was obliged to clip it with a pair of sciſſars, at least when he went into waiting [b]. As to their dress, they were only bound to wear it at the time of their ministring, at other times they were left at their liberty. What relates to their maintenance, revenue and perquisites, will be best seen when we come to speak of the Levites: in the mean time we cannot forbear making one observation upon the garb both of the high and lower priests; in describing of which we have followed Josephus and the current of interpreters, that if their vests had been of the length which they tell us of, and they had had a pair of drawers under them, there would scarce have been any room for that precaution of building the altar without steps, for fear of their discovering that which modesty requires to be hid [c]. We hope this will be a sufficient excuse for our enlarging no further on that subject.

† Matth. xxvii 3.. Mark. xv. 1. [a] See the versions of Josephus, Lamy, Calmet, and others. [b] Comp. Levit. xxi 5, & Ezek. xliv. 20. [c] Exod. xx. ver. ult.

Laws

Laws concerning the Levites.

THESE related either to their office, or to their privileges and incomes, for as to their deſcent, the choice of their tribe, and their conſecration, we have had already occaſion to mention all that is material concerning them; only with reſpect to the laſt of theſe, it is obſervable, that this ceremony was begun with ſprinkling them with the water of ſeparation, which was that which they uſed to purify thoſe who had contracted any legal impurity, with ſhaving their whole body, and waſhing all their cloaths before they were preſented by the people to the high-prieſt [d]. As to their dreſs, it was the ſame with that of the reſt of the Iſraelites, Moſes not having appointed them any particular one. We have likewiſe heretofore given an account of their number, claſſes, incampments, marches, carrying, ſetting up and taking down the tabernacle and all its moveables [e]; of their being ſubject to their brethren; of the family of Aaron, and officiating under them in the lower and more laborious branches of the miniſtry, during all the time that the ark was removing from place to place. But after it was once fixed, they were freed from that labour, and their ſervice became eaſier aad more delightful [f]. This ſeems to be the reaſon why Moſes ordered at firſt, that they ſhould not be admitted into their office, till they had attained to the age of between five and twenty and thirty; and that they ſhould be diſcharged from it at fifty [g], their office then being ſuch as required more ſtrength and vigour: but in David's time, when they were eaſed of it, they were then thought fit for it at the age of twenty [h]. And it is more than probable, that they continued in it much longer than to the fiftieth year, as we ſhall ſhew preſently.

Levites.

Their conſecration and dreſs.

BEFORE David did divide them into claſſes, their miniſtry was in common; they took it by turns, from week to week, as the prieſts did: and their buſineſs was, ſome to bring the water, wood, and other things, that were uſed by the prieſts; others to keep the court of the ſanctuary, and all the utenſils that ſtood out of the tabernacle clean and decent; and others to keep guard at night before the tabernacle.

[d] Num. viii. 7, & ſeq. [e] See before, p. 54. [f] Vide Maim. Baſnag. ubi ſup. [g] Comp. Numb. iv. 3, & viii. 24. [h] 1 Chron. xxiii. 27.

Some

Some were likewiſe appointed to ſing and play upon inſtruments, others to ſtudy and expound the law to the people, and to aſſiſt at the inferior courts of judicature; and theſe provinces were, in all probability, aſſigned to them according to their ſeveral capacities. But after David had once fixed the ark at Jeruſalem (by which time they were become very numerous, and yet not more ſo than the vaſt project he had premeditated, of building the temple, would moſt likely require) that wiſe monarch made ſeveral neceſſary regulations concerning their different employments, which continued till the diſſolution of the Jewiſh polity. We have ſeen above, that they were diſtinguiſhed into three families, namely, Gerſhon, Kohath, and Merari. To each of theſe, which he alſo ſubdivided into twenty four claſſes, which were to ſucceed one another weekly in their turns, he appointed their ſeveral functions, as follows; to the one he aſſigned the aſſiſting of the prieſts at the tabernacle, preparing of flour, cakes, wine, and oil for the ſacrifices, and all other ſervices of that kind; the ſecond was appointed to ſing and play on muſical inſtruments, at proper periods of the divine ſervice; and the third to keep a conſtant guard about the tabernacle, and afterwards about the temple. Over theſe claſſes he appointed from among them proper officers and overſeers of ſeveral ranks, according to their merit or capacities. He choſe likewiſe from among them, men of learning and piety to teach and breed up the younger Levites, either to their miniſtry, or to expound the law unto the people (G); beſides thoſe

(G) The Jews tell us, that the Levites paſt through four different degrees. From one month old to the twentieth year, they were inſtructed in the law of God. From twenty to twenty five, they were taught the functions of their miniſtry. From thence to thirty, they ſerved, as it were, an apprenticeſhip to them, and began to exerciſe themſelves in ſome of the lower branches of it, ſuch as cleanſing the courts and veſſels, guarding the gates, ſinging and playing upon inſtruments. Laſtly, when they attained the thirtieth year, they were peremptorily inſtalled into their office. Some ſuch degrees we find obſerved among the veſtal virgins, who were bound to the ſtricteſt chaſtity during thirty years; the firſt ten of which they ſpent in learning the myſteries of their profeſſion, the ſecond ten they adminiſtred in holy things, and the laſt ten they beſtowed in bringing up of young novices (69). And it is probable, that the apoſtle alluded to this, when he tells Timothy, that they who have performed the office of a deacon well, do pur-

(69) Vide DION. HALICARN. lib. ii.

chaſe

thoſe whom he appointed to aſſiſt at the courts of judicature of every city. Now it is plain, that in all theſe functions there was nothing that could incapacitate a man from performing them after the age of fifty, if we except, as the Jews do, that of ſinging, for which it is poſſible enough for old age to render one incapable, by reaſon of the diſagreeable tremor which that brings to the voice [i].

THESE ſingers king Solomon diſtinguiſhed from their brethren, by their being allowed to wear a kind of linen robe, or ſurplice, when they were upon duty [k]; but the reſt did not obtain that privilege till the reign of king Agrippa, about the year of Chriſt 62, and about ſix years before the deſtruction of the laſt temple. Joſephus adds [l]; that the prieſts did highly reſent it, and obſerves, that ſuch innovations ſeldom went unpuniſhed. It is true, that he calls them ſingers; but 'tis plain he muſt have been either miſtaken or miſcopied; ſeeing there could be no alteration in their caſe, but what was as old as the time of Solomon.

2. THEIR revenues. We have choſen to ſpeak jointly of thoſe of the prieſts and Levites, becauſe they were intermixed together by God's own appointment, at leaſt in their main branches, thoſe of the tithes, cities, and ſome other perquiſites. As for what either of them had in particular, it is ſcarce worth mentioning. The reader may recollect, that according to Jacob's prophecy, the tribe of Levi was to be interſperſed among the other tribes , and that they were excluded, by an expreſs law in Deuteronomy [m], from having any ſhare in the diviſion of the land, and had their portion aſſigned to them out of the tithes, offerings of the altar, and the redemption of the firſt-born of Iſrael, in whoſe ſtead they Their revenues.

[i] Vide OBAD. BARTENOR. Tract. Cholin c. i. § 6. [k] 2 Chron. v. 12. [l] Ant. lib, xx. c. 8.  See Vol. II. p. 440. note (F), & alib. paſſ. [m] Ch. xviii. paſſ.

chaſe to themſelves καλὸν βαθμὸν a good degree (70). Moſes indeed ordered (71), that they ſhould be diſcharged at the age of fifty from ſerving any more; but he adds, in the next verſe, that they ſhould miniſter to their brethren in the tabernacle, and keep the charge, but do no ſervice: by which it is plain, that they were only exempted from the harder ſort of ſervice, but continued ſtill in ſome others, ſuch as they were fitteſt for; in which number the breeding up of the young Levites, teaching, judging, and the like, may be reaſonably reckoned (72).

(70) 1 Tim. iii. 13. (71) Num. viii. 25. (72) Vide Maim. ubi ſup. Abarban. in c Baſnag. R. H tom. iii lib. ii c. 2.

were ſubſtituted. We have already ſpoken of all theſe; but as it was neceſſary, that they ſhould have ſome certain places of abode appointed for them, as ſoon as they were come to the plain of Moab, over-againſt Jericho, God was pleaſed to aſſign them forty eight cities, with their ſuburbs; thirteen of which were to belong to the prieſts, and the other thirty five to the reſt of the tribe of Levi [n] (H). The only difference between them was, that the cities of the prieſts were for the moſt part in the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and conſequently nearer to Jeruſalem; whereas thoſe of the Levites were divided unto them by lot out of all the other tribes on either ſide of Jordan. Thus did God turn Jacob's curſe into a bleſſing, and the prieſts and Levites, whoſe office it was to preſerve knowledge, became thus ſo diſperſed, that the people might be every where ſupplied with it. What theſe cities were, is not worth inquiring, ſeeing we know little more of them than their names, and the tribes they were in. All that we ſhall examine at preſent is, what their rights, privileges, immunities, and revenues conſiſted in, and how far they did extend. (As for the ſix cities of refuge which were choſen out of that number, we ſhall ſpeak of them in a ſeparate article.) With reſpect then to the privilege of the former, which ſome authors have queſtioned the extent of, further than the bare enjoyment of their revenues, we may obſerve on the contrary, that their owners had power to ſell or mortgage them, as well as the other tribes, only with this advantageous difference on their ſide, that they might redeem them at any time, if they were able; and if not, they devolved to them on the year of [n] Numb. xxxv. 1, & ſeq. Joſh. xxi. 10, & ſeq.

(H) The right of the Levitical tribe to theſe cities and lands adjacent is not without ſome difficulties, which have made ſome authors doubt, whether they had any more than the bare uſe and income of, without the power of alienating, them (73). Thus is objected, that Hebron was given to the prieſts as a city of refuge, and yet Caleb, who was of the tribe of Judah, had the fields and villages belonging to it aſſigned to him (74). This difficulty may be eaſily removed, by ſuppoſing with our author, that Caleb did yield the city unto them, becauſe the Lord hath determined it for a city of refuge; but that he reſerved the territories to himſelf, as being out of the caſe. However, as to the prieſts and Levites having power to alienate their houſes and lands, or even to purchaſe new ones, excluſive of thoſe allotted to them, we have ſufficient proof, as the reader will ſee by what follows above.

(73) Vide Baſnag. ubi ſup. c. 7. (74) Joſh. xxi. 11, & ſeq.

Jubilee: whereas, as we obſerved before, thoſe alienated houſes of the laity, which ſtood in walled cities, if not redeemed within the year, were irrecoverably loſt to the firſt owner [o]. Hence it is plain, that their right to theirhouſes was even ſtronger than that of the people, for which reaſon it was called their inheritance [p]. The caſe was indeed different with reſpect to the grounds that were annexed to thoſe cities, which could not be alienated upon any account [q]; but the reaſon of it was, that they were in the nature of a common to them, to which therefore every one had an equal right, they being the only paſture ground they had for their cattle; and if they agreed by conſent to incloſe or appropriate any part for fields, orchards, gardens, and the like, the diviſion was made in proportion to the largeneſs of their families, which could not have ſubſiſted, had ſuch an alienation been permitted.

It is likewiſe manifeſt, that their being excluded from any portion in the diſtribution of the land, was ſo far from depriving them of the right of poſſeſſion, or even purchaſe, that we have ſeveral inſtances to the contrary in both caſes, and they authoriſed by God. With reſpect to the firſt, we find, among other regulations concerning vows, that if a man had vowed his houſe or land unto the Lord, and had not wherewith, or was unwilling, to redeem them, they were then to continue ſacred unto God [r], that is, the prieſts became the right owners of them; accordingly we find, that the high-prieſt Abiathar had ſome eſtate of his own, into which he was relegated by Solomon [s]; and even in the apoſtle's time, Barnabas, who was a Levite of Cyprus, had ſome land which he ſold for the uſe of the church [t]. To this we may add, if what Maimon tells us be right, that the tribe of Levi had their twelfth ſhare of all the lands, which were got by the ſword [u]. As for their having it in their power to purchaſe eſtates, we need but read the 32d chapter of Jeremiah, who was a prieſt, where we ſhall find a curious account of his purchaſing of a piece of land, with all the formalities that were then uſed in ſuch caſes [w].

EVERY one of theſe cities had ſuburbs, the limits whereof were alſo appointed by God himſelf [x]; but Moſes has expreſſed them in ſuch terms, that it has given more pains to interpreters to reconcile the two numbers mentioned by him, [o] Levit. xx. 29, & ſeq. [p] Ibid. ver. 33. [q] Ibid. ver 34. [r] Levit. xxvii. 14, & ſeq. [s] 1 King ii. 26. [t] Acts iv. 36, 37. [u] Halak. Shemit veyobel Vide BASNAG. ubi ſup. [w] Ver. 7, & ſeq. [x] Halak. Havoda. Hacokabim Umazaloth, ap. BASNAG. R. H. tom. i. lib. 1. c. 7.

than our readers would care to be troubled with (I); in which uncertainty we are willing to rely on the Jews, who tell us, that those two numbers were to be taken jointly; so that the extent of those suburbs, or rather territories, should extend to the distance of three thousand cubits from the out-walls[y]. They add, that the first thousand were assigned for pasture ground, on which therefore it was not lawful to build, sow, or plant; but within the limits of the other two thousand cubits, they might do any of them. One thing further is remarkable, namely, that they were not permitted to bury their dead either within those cities or their suburbs; but that they had, according to the Jews, a piece of ground allotted to them by the people for a burying place, which was quite out of the verge of those limits. We shall venture no farther on the rights and privileges of these cities, concerning which the Jews tell us wonders, but without any probability; those that are fond of such fables may find more than they can give credit to in Maimon[z], and other Jewish [y] Vide Commentat. in Ex. xxi 13. Num. xxxv. 6. Deut. iv. 41. & xix. 2. [z] In Num. xxxv.

(I) Moses expresses himself in one verse thus, and the suburbs of the cities of the Levites, from the wall of the city outwards shall be, a thousand cubits round about, and in the next verse it is said, thou shalt measure from without the city, on the east——west——north——and south sides of it, two thousand cubits, and the city shall be in the middle, &c. (75). To reconcile these two numbers, Junius (76) has supposed the latter to be mentioned kat'exegesin, of the diameter of the suburb, the city abstracted, so that which way soever one measured it, it had two thousand cubits; but this construction seems to us somewhat too forced and unnatural; we therefore think with the Jews, that the two numbers may be more properly joined together, namely, the last as a further addition to the first. The word מגרש. Migrash, which we translate, Suburbs, doth properly signify expulsion, or thrusting out, from גרש. to expel (77); and consequently in a figurative sense, may signify extension. Accordingly the Chaldee renders it a space The sense might therefore, we think, run naturally thus: the first extent of the Levitical cities shall be one thousand cubits from the out-wall; after which thou shalt measure again from without the city another space of two thousand cubits, and this shall be the extent of their outward space or territories. We own however; that this latter sense is not altogether literal, but we hope, it will be found less forced than the former, and to remove the seeming contradiction to the full as well.

(75) Num. xxxv ver. 4, & 5. (76) In loc. (77) Vide Kimch. Buxtorf. Pagn. in Rad.

commentators

commentators on theſe places of the pentateuch, where mention is made of them [a]. This however we may ſafely add concerning the cities themſelves, namely, that they were not taken by equal numbers out of every tribe, but according as they were found more or leſs abounding in each of them. Thus for inſtance, the tribe of Judah, whoſe lot was full of them, did allot nine, whereas that of Benjamin, which had but a few, was obliged to part with four only [b]; as to the nomination and diſtribution of them among the Levites, it was done in the ſame manner as they had done the land itſelf, namely, by lot; which was the moſt effectual to prevent all difference; for even this tribe doth not ſeem to have been ſo diſintereſted, that any other method could have ſatisfied them but this (K).

Laws concerning the ſix cities of refuge.

THESE were choſen out of thoſe forty two which had been aſſigned to the tribe of Levi [c]. They differed from the Aſyla of the Greeks and Romans, in that they were deſigned to protect innocent perſons only, from the rigor of the law, in caſes of involuntary homicide; whereas theirs did equally ſhelter the guilty and innocent from it. There is an expreſs command in Exodus with relation to wilful murder, that the guilty perſon ſhall be torn even from God's altar to be put to death [d]; from which one may naturally infer, that the tabernacle was a ſanctuary to the innocent, not only during their wandering in the wilderneſs, but all the time of their abode in the land of Canaan; at leaſt, the inſtance of Joab's taking refuge there ſeems to imply as much, though his crime excluded him from the benefit of it [e]. And indeed ſo ſevere were God's laws againſt murder, that if it was even committed in a fray, or in correcting of a ſervant

[a] Rab. SALOM. in loc. vide & MOS. DE COTZI, MUNST. JUN. & al. in loc. [b] Joſh. xxi. paſſ. [c] Num. xxxv. 6. [d] Exod. xxi. 14. 1. [e] 1 Kings ii. 28.

(K) According to thoſe lots, the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, furniſhed the thirteen cities which were allotted to the prieſts; thoſe of Ephraim, Dan, and half of Manaſſeh on the other ſide of Jordan, yielded ten to the Kohathites: the Gerſhonites received thirteen, namely, two from the other half of Manaſſeh, three from Naphtali, and eight from Iſſachar and Aſher; and laſtly, Reuben, Zebulun, and Gad gave four, each, to the Merarites (78).

(78) Vide Joſh. xxi. paſſ.

and other cases which our milder laws call chance-medley, the guilty person could not go unpunished [f]. And where the fact was accidental and involuntary, tho' his concern for the life of the innocent person was such, that he not only appointed these cities for his protection, but seemed, as it were, to take the fault upon himself (L), yet he condemned him to a kind of banishment, till the death of the high-priest then in being [g] (M); insomuch that if he ventured out of the limits, Josephus says out of the walls, of the city [h], it was lawful for any relations of the deceased either to kill him, or to have him put to death by the hand of Justice.

[f] Exod. xxi. 12, 20. [g] Num. xxxv. 25, & seq. [h] Ant. lib. iv. c. 7.

(L) The words are, if a man lie not in wait, but God deliver him into his hand. This we purposely take notice of, because these and such like expressions, which occur in scripture, whatever sinister sense some may put upon them, import no more, according to the genius of the Hebrew idiom, than that though a man may die contrary to the seeming course of nature, yet he cannot be taken off without the permission of heaven; whose providence directs all such events, either for the punishment of the person, or for some other wise purposes beyond our reach. However, it is plain, that it is only used in this place, to shew the injustice there would be in punishing a man for an act which had been so directed by providence, that one person lost his life without the least design in the other of hurting him.

(M) We shall not trouble the reader with the various reasons, which interpreters have conjectured, concerning the time of a man's return being fixed to the death of the high-priest. Some of the Jews, who affirm, that the death of so great a person, which was universally lamented, was the most proper motive to make all resentment on the part of the prosecutor to cease, seem rather to trifle than to be in earnest (79); and one would wonder, that they should have been followed by any Christians. But the far greater part of these look upon this circumstance to have been typical of the reconciliation, which Christ, our eternal high-priest, made of friends to God by his death (80). This is what the apostle to the Hebrews seems to intimate (81): however, it must be owned, that some men have given too great a scope to this way of allegorising; and that, where so little light is to be had from the sacred writings, it would be more adviseable to say nothing, than to say all that a pious fancy suggests.

(79) Vide Maim. More Nevoch. c. 40. (80) Hieron. August. & al. vide & Grot. Jun. Corn. a Lap. & al. mult. in loc. (81) Heb. ix. 15.

THESE

THESE cities were not only for the Iſraelites, but for all ſtrangers that either lived among them, or came thither occaſionally. The Jews do indeed confine the benefit of them to their proſelytes; but this ſenſe ſeems to flow more from their narrowneſs of ſoul, than from the words of the text [i]. We may remember, that Moſes ordered three of them to be aſſigned on either ſide of Jordan [k]. This partition ſeems indeed ſomewhat unequal, becauſe one ſide had but two tribes and a half, and the other nine and a half; the reaſon of which ſome Jews tell us was, becauſe there were a great many more homicides committed in the former by way of ſelf-defence, than in the latter: but this is ridiculous, and that of R. Nachman is by far more probable and judicious; namely, that the extent of the country of the former was at leaſt as large as that of the latter, tho' leſs inhabited; which made it neceſſary for them to have ſo many of thoſe cities. However as to thoſe tribes on the other ſide, God permitted them to add three more to their number, whenever the largeneſs of their conqueſts ſhould make it neceſſary [l]; but as this depended upon their conſtant obedience, and they, on the contrary, proved continually ſtubborn and diſobedient, they never found occaſion for this addition: for which reaſon they think it will be made in the days of the Meſſiah.

HOW, where, and by whom, the examination of the manſlayer was made, in order to his being admitted to, or excluded, the benefit of the city of refuge; that is, whether by the next judges of the place where the fact was committed, or by thoſe of the city, where the man fled for ſanctuary, is neither clear from the text, nor agreed by interpreters. However, as a late author juſtly obſerves [m], from an expreſſion in Deut. and Joſhua [n], there ſeems to have been a double trial, one before the judges of the city of refuge, and one before what the text calls there the congregation; by which is underſtood either thoſe of the place where the fact was committed, or perhaps the great council; and this ſeems to us to have been neceſſary only when the avenger of blood appealed from thoſe of the place of refuge. As ſoon therefore as a man had been unfortunately guilty of accidental homicide, his firſt buſineſs was to flee, with all convenient haſte, to the next city of that kind. The ways leading to it were, by God's own appoint-

[i] Vide Num. xxxv. 15.
[l] Ibid. ver. 9.
[k] Ibid. ver. 14. Deut. xix. paſſim.
[m] CALM. ſub. voc. Refuge.
[n] comp. Deut. xix. 11, 12. with Joſh. xx. 6, 9.

ment

ment, to be kept in good repair (N), that nothing might retard his ſpeed. As ſoon as he came to the place, he preſented

(N) The text (82) ſays only, thou ſhalt prepare thee a way, and divide the coaſts of the land into three parts, that every ſlayer may flee thither. But the Talmudiſts and Rabbies add a great number of circumſtances for keeping thoſe roads in continual repair, that the perſon may meet with no obſtruction in his flight. Theſe roads, according to them, were to be 32 cubits in breadth, ſmooth, plain, and without aſcent, deſcent, or ditches. At every place where the road parted, a poſt was to be ſet up to direct them, which had the word מקלט, miklat, refuge, engraven upon it. Every brook or river was to have a good bridge; all watery places were to be drained, and the ſurface kept ſmooth and hard. To theſe precepts the words of the Baptiſt, prepare ye the ways of the Lord, make his paths ſtrait, every valley ſhall be filled, and every mountain levelled, &c. are thought to allude. Once a year at leaſt, in the month Adar, which anſwers in part to our February, the magiſtrates of every city were obliged to viſit them, and ſee that they were kept in good order; otherwiſe, in caſe the avenger chanced to overtake and kill the ſlayer, the magiſtracy of the place were judged guilty of his death. As for the cities of refuge, they were to be of a moderate bigneſs, well furniſhed with water, proviſions, artiſts, and all manner of conveniencies, weapons excepted. The reaſon they give for excluding this laſt was, leſt the avenger ſhould, in a fit of anger, make uſe of them againſt the ſlayer (83). Thus far they agree, in ſome other points they are divided. Some pretend, that the refuged was to be kept at the charge of the city; and others affirm, that he was obliged to follow ſome trade, if he could not maintain himſelf without it. Some ſay, that the houſes in the ſuburbs were to obſtruct the entrance of the proſecutor, till they had taken all proper means to pacify him; and others, that they only ſent ſome grave and reverend deputies to meet him without the gates, to perſuade him to clemency and moderation. Some add, that the tribe of Levi was excluded the benefit of theſe ſanctuaries; ſo that if any of them happened to kill a man, how accidentally ſoever, they were forced to wander from place to place (84). The modern Jews do ſo far keep up this cuſtom, that a manſlayer is baniſhed for three years into ſome city, in which they have a ſynagogue; where, by way of penance, he is forced to ſay aloud, I am a manſlayer, at his entering into the ſynagogue, and at every courteous civility that is ſhewed to him (85).

(82) Deut. xix. 3. (83) Vide Gemar. Tract. מכלם, præcept. aff. 75. & ſeq. Rab. Salom. Munſter, & al. in Num. xxxv. (84) Targ. Onkel. Fag in Num. xxxv. (85) Vide Baſnag. lib. ii. c. 7.

Maimon

ed himſelf to the judges of it, and declared the occaſion of his coming, and the manner of his killing the perſon, and according as his account appeared true or falſe, he was admitted to, or excluded, their protection. If the avenger of blood, who was always the neareſt relation to the deceaſed, came to demand juſtice, he and his evidence were heard, and the judges did either confirm their former ſentence in favour of the manſlayer, or delivered him up to be puniſhed, if the fact was proved to be wilfully done: but if the former, he was to be conducted to the place where the fact was committed, and there tried a ſecond time; and if he was found innocent, he was reconducted to the place of refuge, with a ſufficient guard, and remained there free from all farther proſecutions; and at the death of the high-prieſt he was at liberty to return to his own home. This, at leaſt, is what the generality of interpreters conclude to have been their proceeeding, in ſuch caſes. However, as the account we have of it from Moſes is far from being clear in this point, and the cities of refuge were ſometimes at ſuch a diſtance from the place where the fact was committed, that the manſlayer might be eaſily overtaken by the proſecutor, before he could reach it: we think it at leaſt as reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that he went and ſurrendered himſelf to the judges of the neareſt place, and, having cleared himſelf before them from the guilt of wilful murder, was by their order conducted ſafely to the next city of refuge; where the magiſtrates had a further hearing of the cauſe, and either confirmed, or revoked, the ſentence of the former, according to the evidence of it. It is true, that what we quoted out of the rabbies in the laſt note, about the conveniencies of the roads leading to ſuch places, would be needleſs in this caſe; but we look upon their teſtimony to be very dubious, Maimon and ſome other rabbies tell us from antient tradition, that all the forty two cities of the Levites were places of refuge; with this difference however from the ſix properly ſo called, that the former might refuſe their protection to any man, how innocent ſoever, but the latter were obliged to receive him; and that in the former he lived at his own, and in the latter at the public charge (86). The Miſhnah on the contrary tells, upon the authority of R. Eleazar, that the death either of the high-prieſt, or of him that is anointed for the war, reſtored the ſlayer to his freedom, and that the mothers of theſe two prelates did find the refugees in food and raiment, that they might not by their prayers accelerate the death of their ſons, in order to their ſpeedy releaſe from their baniſhment (87).

(86) Idem ibid. vide & Calm. ſub. voc. Refuge. (87) Ap. Hotting. in Goodwin, lib. ji. c. 5. ſub note 9.

and

and in some cases plainly wrong. Thus the Talmud tells us [o], that those cities were to be situated by some rivers, in order to be well supplied with water and all kinds of provision, that the access to them was to be easy and without ascent; and yet it is plain, that the far greater part were built upon rocks. There are many other particulars which they tell us there, which we purposely omit, because they are still more incredible. But the reader is at liberty to choose which supposition he likes best.

BESIDES these cities of refuge, the tabernacle, as we have partly observed above, and afterwards the temple, had likewise the privilege of sanctuaryship, especially the altar of burnt-offering [p]. The rabbies do indeed tell us, the latter was only for the priests; but we have seen the contrary in the instance of Joab mentioned above. Those indeed who were guilty of wilful murder sheltered themselves there in vain, and were, by God's express command, to be taken away from the very altar, to condign punishment. To this end there were proper judges appointed there also, whose business it was to make a strict examination of the case, and either to deliver up the criminal into the hands of justice, or send the innocent under a proper escort to one of the cities of refuge [q]. There are several other material circumstances relating to those kinds of cases, which Moses having left no particular directions about, they may be reasonably supposed to have been left to the discretion of the judges. Such as, for instance, when the fact was committed just before, and the sentence of the judges not obtained in favour of the homicide till after the death of the high-priest; or when it was done in the time of an interregnum; or in case the high-priest was killed by some friends of the exiled person; or lastly, when the high-priest himself became a manslayer, which was far from impossible: concerning which, and several others of the like nature, the Talmudists have made very judicious and equitable regulations, but which we shall not trouble our readers with.

The altar a place of refuge.

Nethinims. THE Nethinims are the last sort of persons dedicated to the worship of God (O). These were not of the children of Israel, [o] Gemar. Tract. Makloth. [p] Vide PHILO, Legat al Cai. [q] MAIM. Tract. דישה שמורת נפש, cap. 5. Vide HOTTING. in GOODW. lib. ii. c. 5. note 2. & Commentat. in Num. XXXV.

(O) We may however add another sort, who were called אנשי מעמד, Anshe Maamad, Station men, which were a pious, grave sort

Iſrael, but of the Gibeonites, who obtained a treaty of peace with the former by a ſtratagem, which we have taken notice of before †, and whom Joſhua condemned to the loweſt and moſt laborious offices in the tabernacle under the Levites; ſuch as the drawing of water, the fetching and hewing of wood for the altar, and the like [r]. We do not find that this name of Nethinims was given to them till after the captivity, when a ſmall number returned with Ezra and the reſt of Iſrael from Babylon. That name imports as much as given, and Ezra ſays [s], they were given or appointed by David and other kings to ſerve in the temple under the Levites; and in another place, that they were the children of Solomon's ſervants [t]. But by this time the name was not confined to the Gibeonites alone, but was given alſo to Canaanites, whom theſe princes had conquered and converted [u]. We read of ſome ſuch abject perſons alſo in the time of Moſes, who mentions them in his laſt pathetic ſpeech, in theſe words: You all ſtand this day before the Lord - - - - your little ones and your wives, and the ſtranger that is in your camp, from the hewer of thy wood, to the drawer of thy water [w]. And probably the ſort of perſons, choſen, not out of the tribe of Levi alone, but out of all the twelve indifferently, to aſſiſt at the ſacrifices, as repreſentatives of a certain number of people. They were called by that name, becauſe, as we obſerved before, no man was allowed to be in any but a ſtanding poſture, during the time of divine ſervice. The law required, that every man ſhould come and make his offerings, of what kind ſoever, in perſon, and to ſtay there till the ceremony was ended; but becauſe this was not practicable in many caſes, as when an offering was made for the whole nation, or in times of great reſort, becauſe the place could not contain them; they choſe theſe repreſentatives to perform that duty for them. Theſe were divided, as the prieſts and Levites, into twenty four claſſes, who took their turns weekly as they did. Each claſs having a head or captain, who was called ראש מעמד, Roſh Mahmad, or head of the ſtation (88). We do not indeed read of any ſuch order of men in the ſacred writings, and conſequently do not think it of divine inſtitution; but the Jews do fetch it from the oral law, and believe that it began long before the captivity; but moſt Chriſtians are rather of opinion, that it began ſoon after their return from it (89); for which reaſon we ſhall ſay no more of it.

† See Vol. II. p. 176. [r] Joſh. ix. 23, 27. [s] Ezr. viii. 20. [t] Ibid. ii. 58. [u] 1 Kings ix. 20, 21, & alib. [w] Deut. xxix. 10, 11.

(88) Vide Moſ. Kotz. ם טצות גדול. (89) Goodwin's Moſ. & Aar. lib. i. cap. 5. Hotting. Diſſert. de Viris Stationar.

lowneſs of their condition might be one main reaſon, why ſo few cared to return from the captivity, where they did perhaps fare better. For we do not read of above two hundred and twenty that came with Ezra[x], and three hundred and ninety two with Zerubbabel[y]; which number was ſo inſufficient for the exigencies of the temple, that Joſephus tells us, they did inſtitute a feſtival, which he calls Xylophoria, on which the people were obliged to carry a certain quantity of wood to the temple, to ſupply the altar of burnt-offering[z]: and not unlikely, that alſo of bringing water thither from the pool of Siloah, on the laſt day of the feaſt of tabernacles, the inſtitution of which is attributed to the prophet Zechariah, of which we have made ſome mention before.

II. Of things conſecrated to the ſervice of God.

THESE were, 1. The tabernacle. 2. The ark. 3. The two altars. 4. The candleſtick and other utenſils belonging to it. 5. The table of ſhew-bread. And 6. The court, with all the utenſils which were repoſited in it. Concerning all which, whatever can be ſaid with any tolerable certainty is ſo well known to the curious in this kind of learning, and ſo diſregarded by the reſt of the world, that we ſhould gladly content ourſelves with the bare mention of them, did we think that our readers would be ſatisfied with it, without a further deſcription of them. It may indeed appear ſomewhat ſurpriſing, that Moſes ſhould have beſtowed almoſt as many pages in deſcribing the ſtructure of the tabernacle and its ſumptuous furniture, as he has lines in his account of the creation, and yet that we ſhould be ſo much in the dark about it; and that there ſhould be ſo much room left for conjecture, for want of knowing the proper ſignification of a great number of its parts and materials. But as this is plainly the caſe, we ſhall not expatiate upon them, unleſs we can do it upon ſome ſure grounds, or where they have an apparent relation to the goſpel.

The tabernacle. 1. THE tabernacle was built by the command and directions of God himſelf, that he might dwell in the midſt of his people[a]. Their rebellions and murmurings having provoked him to prolong the term of their wandering in the wilderneſs, and thereby delayed the time of their entering into the poſſeſſion of the promiſed land; it was neceſſary that this ſacred place, where the moſt ſolemn parts of the divine

[x] Ezr. viii. 20. [y] Ibid. ii. 58. [z] Wars of the Jews, lib. ii. c. 17. [a] Vide Exod. xxv. 8, & alib. paſſ.

worſhip

worſhip were to be performed, ſhould be fitted to their frequent marches, and be eaſily ſet up and taken down, as occaſion required. For which reaſon, among other names which it has in the Moſaic writings (P), it is moſt commonly called by that of Obel, which doth properly ſignify a tent; but ſuch a magnificent one, both in its ſtructure, materials, and utenſils, as might inſpire both the Iſraelites, and all other nations, with an awful reſpect and regard for the ſervice of God. To this end, the moſt coſtly and precious things, which they had brought with them from Egypt, and from thoſe other kingdoms which they had conquered, were liberally beſtowed by the people, and put into the hands of the ableſt artificers, to be wrought in a manner ſuitable to the deſign of it, and to the richneſs of the materials [b].

OUR learned Spencer has here again been at the pains to fetch this tabernacle, the ark, altars, and all their appurtenances from Egypt [c]. He quotes the ſacred and prophane writings to prove, that the Heathens had ſuch portable temples, in which they depoſited the moſt valuable utenſils that belonged to their religion. It is indeed eaſy enough to prove, that they had both theſe and many other things very like thoſe of the Jews; but to infer from thence, that they had them before them, and that God condeſcended ſo far to the genius of the Iſraelites, as to introduce them into his own worſhip, to be a kind of fence againſt their proneneſs to their idolatrous ſuperſtitions, is not only very preſumptuous and unlikely, but

[b] See Vol. II. p ult. [c] De leg. rit. Hebr. diſſert. i.

(P) The tabernacle is called by ſeveral names in ſcripture, the moſt common of which is that of אהל מועד. Obel Mobed, the tent or tabernacle of the congregation or aſſembly, becauſe it was made in the faſhion of a magnificent tent or pavilion (90). For this reaſon Joſephus calls it μεταφέρομενος ναὸς, a portable temple (91); we find it elſewhere called מקדש, Mikdaſh, the holy place (92), and by the Septuagint ἁγιάσμα, becauſe it was made holy by God's preſence; it is therefore elſewhere called, by way of excellency, המישכן, Hamiſhcan, the habitation, which the Greek renders σκηνὴ accordingly (93). Sometimes this laſt is joined with the word העדות, Habeduth, teſtimony (94), the habitation or tabernacle of teſtimony, becauſe God delivered his oracles from thence; laſtly, it is in other parts of ſcripture called היכל, Hecal, palace, and the palace of the Lord (95), which name was afterwards given to the temple.

(90) Exod. xxviii. 43, & alib. paſſ. (91) Ant. lib iii c. 5. (92) Exod xxv. 8. (93) Ibid. ver. 9. (94) Ibid. xxxviii. 21. (95) 1 Sam. i. 9. iii. 3. 1 Kings xxi. 1, & alib. paſſ.

doth too evidently thwart the known design of them, and the typical application which the apostle to the Hebrews makes of them [d]. And yet this sophistical way of reasoning is justly enough observed by a later author  to run through all his writings on this subject; for which reason we shall forbear saying more about it, having so often given our reasons for dissenting from him. The reader, however, may see this last supposition sufficiently exploded by the author last quoted, and but weakly defended since by Le Clerc †.

THE tabernacle was of an oblong square figure, thirty cubits long, ten cubits broad, and ten in height. It had two apartments within, divided by a row of four columns of Shittim wood (Q), covered over with massive gold, fixed in [d] Heb. ix. pass. & ver. 8.  Vide SAURIN's discourse on the Pentateuch, disc. liv. pass. & alib. pass. † Bibliot. A. M. tom. xii. part 2. § 1. pass.

(Q) This wood, though so famous in scripture, is yet so unknown, that interpreters have not ventured to translate its name. St. Jerom has retained its Hebrew one, and the Septuagint only calls it imputrible wood; and indeed it is more than probable, that it was called Shittim from the place where it grew, often mentioned in scripture †. Our readers therefore may be perhaps willing enough to be let into that little light that can be got about it. The most probable account we can meet with is that of St. Jerom, who says, that it is a hard, smooth wood, free from knots, and of exquisite beauty and lightness; insomuch, that the rich used to make screws of it for their presses: that its leaves and colour were not unlike the white thorn, but that it grew to such a height, that one might saw it into boards of a considerable length, and that it grew no where in the Roman empire, but only in the uncultivated parts of Arabia (96). Hence some authors have concluded, that he meant the black Acacia; not only because it has all the smoothness, hardness, length, and beauty, which he speaks of, but because this latter is the only one that is to be found in those parts of Arabia (97). But whoever reads the description, which other authors give us of the Acacia (98), will find, that it cannot be the Shittim of St. Jerom, though we are told by very many travellers, that it is the only tree that grows in these deserts (99); but be it which of the two it will, it is plain they were both very fit for Moses's purpose.

† Num. xxv. 1. xxxiii. 49. Micah. vi. 5. (96) Hieron. Comm. in Joel iii. ad fin. in Mich. vi. & 5, & alib. (97) Bellon's Observ. lib. ii. c. 56, & 80. Ætius, lib. iv. c. 11. (98) Vide Prosp. Alpin. ap. Auctor. Notar. in lib. iv Theophrast. Thevenot, La Rocque, & al. (99) Vide Le Clerc, Calmet, & al. Comm. in Exod. xxv. 5. Theven. La Rocque, Radzivil, Ludolph, & al.

It

in the ſame number of pedeſtals or ſockets of ſilver; from which probably might come that antient method of ſetting porphyry columns on baſes of white marble. Moſes doth not tell us, whether they were round or ſquare: but it ſeems more likely to have been the latter, not only becauſe they became much in vogue in the inſide of great buildings, under the name of pilaſters; but alſo becauſe they were more proper for the deſign for which they were intended, and more eaſy of carriage, with the boards and other flat pieces, than round ones. To the tops, or rather capitals, of theſe, was faſtened by golden hooks, a rich embroidered curtain, which divided the whole breadth of the place, an diſtinguiſhed the outward, called the holy, from the inward apartment, called the moſt holy, or the holy of holies. This latter was but ten cubits deep (R), and conſequently ſquare. The other

It is certain, at leaſt, that it could not be a kind of cedar, as ſome have imagined; not only becauſe the Hebrew has another name for that tree, but becauſe there grew none nearer than the Libanus, which was at too great a diſtance from Sinai; and yet the Jews are not aſhamed of entertaining a more ridiculous notion, that Moſes cauſed it to be brought from Egypt, whither Jacob had carried and ſown the firſt ſeeds of it, foreſeeing what uſe his poſterity would have for it (100). But had Moſes known any thing of a tabernacle being to be reared in the wilderneſs before he came thither, it is certain, the Jews had ſomething more valuable to load themſelves with than timber, how rare and uſeful ſoever.

(R) This proportion is not mentioned by Moſes; ſo that the reader is at his liberty to fix the partition in any other place, or, according to the rules of architecture, in the middle, and ſo make both apartments of equal length. What has determined the generality of interpreters to fix it where we do is, that in the temple of Solomon, the moſt holy place was but half the length of the holy one (1), and is reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been made according to the dimenſions of the tabernacle; the only difference between them being, that the one was a fixed, and the other a moveable temple. To this may be added, that the moſt holy having nothing but the mercy-ſeat in it, and none but the high-prieſt being permitted to enter it, leſs room ſufficed than for the outward one, which had the table of ſhew-bread, the altar of incenſe, candleſtick, &c. and was more frequented. Joſephus (2), though he agrees with Moſes in the length of the tabernacle, adds two cubits both to its height and breadth, with ſome other particularities, ſome not mentioned by Moſes, and others differing from him. See the next note. However,

(100) Vide Baſnag. tom. ii. lib ii ch. 3. (1) Vide 1 King. vi. 16, 17. 2 Chron. iii. 3. (2) Ant. lib. iii. c. 6.

other was twenty cubits; and at the entrance of it, at the weſt end, hung a ſecond curtain to another row of five columns, of the ſame fabricature with the former, only the baſes of theſe were of braſs, and this covered the inſide of the holy place from common ſight. The curtain, or, as it is called, the vail, that parted the holy from the moſt holy place, was made of the richeſt ſtuff, both for matter and workmanſhip; and adorned with cherubims, feſtoons, and other ornaments, curiouſly embroidered upon it. The whole was incloſed on the north, weſt, and ſouth ſide, with a flight of boards of the ſame wood, covered alſo with plates of gold, and fixed below and above into ſockets or mortiſes like the columns. Theſe boards were ten cubits in length, and one and half in breadth; ſo that there were twenty on each ſide, and eight at the weſt end. They were moreover faſtened to one another, by a five-fold row of golden rings at equal diſtance one over the other, five to each board; and through theſe were run five bars of gilt Shittim wood, which locked or unlocked them on thoſe three ſides. As for the eaſt end, it had no boards, but was ſheltered by a vail, like that which divided the two apartments, except that this outward one had no cherubims embroidered upon it, as the innermoſt had: for theſe were never expoſed to public ſight, but it was only adorned with flowers, leaves, and ſuch like embelliſhments of needle-work [e]. How low this curtain did hang, is neither expreſſed in the text, nor agreed about; ſome thinking, that it came no lower than five cubits, and afforded the people a view of what was done in the holy place [f], others believing that it touched the ground, and concealed it all [g]; which laſt is the more probable of the two (S). The whole had ever, it is not improper here to take notice, once for all, that the cubits were ſomething longer than ours, though how much is not agreed. The moſt received opinion is, that from twenty to twenty two inches. The Jews add a ſtrange diſtinction between the cubits within and without the tabernacle, making the former longer by one hand, or three inches, than the latter: but we find no warrant for it but their bare word

[e] Exod. xxvi. 36. [f] JOSEPH. Ant. lib. iii. c. 6. [g] PHILO ap. BASNAG. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 5.

(S) Joſephus adds further, that there was another curtain over that which came down to the ground, and was to preſerve it from the weather, being made of ſtuff that was proof againſt rain, but that it was drawn aſide on the ſabbath and other feſtivals, to give the had four different coverings, the two innermoſt of which were by far the richeſt, being of a beautiful light blue mohair, ſtriped with ſcarlet and purple, or crimſon, and adorned with cherubims [h]. The other two were made, the under one of ram-ſkins, with the wool on, of ſcarlet dye; and the uppermoſt of all, of badger's ſkins, of a light blue. Theſe were to preſerve the other two from wind and rain; for which reaſon they were made to hang down to the ground on the three ſides that were boarded, whilſt they left the outward vail open to public view on the weſt end, which was the entrance into that ſacred place. The inſide of both theſe apartments was ſtill made more awful by the darkneſs that reigned in them: for we do not find that there were any apertures made for the light; ſo that the moſt holy had none but what the cenſer gave it, when the high-prieſt

[h] Exod. xxvi. 1.

the people a view of the inner one, and of its ornaments; if ſo, it muſt at the ſame time expoſe the altar of incenſe, candleſtick, &c. to public ſight. Philo, on the contrary, pretends (3), that no layman was ſuffered to ſee the fumigations which were performed within that place, the prieſts being the only perſons who had that privilege. This ſeems at leaſt more likely, by what we read of Zacharias's tarrying longer than uſual in the holy place, and of the people's waiting without not knowing what had happened to him (4). However that be, Moſes calls theſe two curtains or vails by different names, namely, this outward one by the name of מָסָךְ, Muſſak which only ſignifies a covering, whereas the inward, which divided the holy from the moſt holy place, he calls פָּרֹכֶת, Parocheth, from Parach, which ſignifies to ſnatch away, and figuratively, to deliver, becauſe it covered the mercy-ſeat, and kept it from public ſight.

The Talmud adds another particular concerning this laſt vail; namely, that it conſiſted of two curtains, which hung parallel acroſs the tabernacle, at the diſtance of two cubits from each other; and that when the high-prieſt went into the moſt holy place, he lifted up the firſt curtain at one end of it, and ſo walked between them quite to the other end, and then entered within the ſecond curtain, and marched forward towards the ark (5): if ſo, it was the moſt effectual way to keep that ſacred place from ſight; but we dare not warrant the truth of it. The apoſtle to the Hebrews mentions indeed a ſecond vail *, but whether in alluſion to this double curtain, or, what ſeems more probable, in oppoſition to the Muſſak, or outward vail, we ſhall not determine.

(3) Ap. Baſnag. ubi ſup. (4) Luke i. 21. (5) Vide Maim. Kele Haminikdaſh. * Hebr. ix. 3.

weſt

went into it on expiation-day: as for the holy place, it had the golden candlestick with a sufficient number of branches to enlighten it in the night. We shall follow the Jewish lawgiver no farther, in his succinct account of every minute part that composed this portable edifice, much less those who have commented upon him; the greatest part of whom have given such a scope to their luxuriant fancies, that they seem rather to have viewed it with the utmost nicety, than to have taken their description from him: we think it sufficient for us to say, that there was nothing wanting in it, that could make it rich, sumptuous, and venerable, firm, lasting, and easily moved [i].

Of the Mercy-seat and ark of the testimony.

The mercy-seat and ark.

THESE were the two chief things that were deposited in the most holy place, and the former was as a lid or cover to the latter; for which reason some interpreters have fancied, that this was all that was meant by the word Kaphoreth, by which Moses calls it. But most versions do more properly render it the Propitiatory [k], others the Oracle [l], and ours the Mercy-seat (T); because God is said to have heard their prayers, to have delivered his oracles from thence, and to dwell between the cherubims which cover it. Besides, it is plain, that it had a more than ordinary sanctity attributed to it, and that it was looked upon as the place of God's immediate presence; for which reason there were such severe judgments inflicted on those who presumed to approach it [m]. Moses was commanded to make it of pure gold [n]; from which one may conclude, that it was not made of Shittim wood overlaid with gold, like the ark, the golden table, and other ſacred utenſils. The length of it was two cubits and half, and the breadth of it one cubit and half; ſo that it exactly fitted the dimenſions of the ark. It was fixed with the cherubims that over-ſhadowed in a frame, or as Moſes calls it, a crown [o], not of a round, but oblong ſquare figure, which cloſed the upper part of the ark, like a rim or ogee. As to the cherubims, it is certain, that they were made of gold, but whether ſolid, and caſt of the ſame piece, and in the ſame mold with the mercy-ſeat, as ſome Jews and Chriſtians render it [p], or only chaſed and hammered, as the original, which only expreſſes it by hardened gold, ſeems rather to intimate, is not worth diſputing. It would indeed be more material to know ſomething concerning their form, poſture, and attitude; but Moſes has here alſo left us in the dark, except where he ſays, that they ſtretched out their wings on high, and covered the mercy-ſeat with them from each end of it, and faced one another, with their faces turned down towards the mercy-ſeat [q] (V); from [o] Ibid. ver. 11. [p] CHALD. Paraph. R. SAL. ARR. MONTAN. TREMEL. & al. in loc. ver. 18. [q] Ibid. ver. 20.

[i] Ibid. Josh. iii. 4. [k] LXX [l] Hieron. Vulgat. & al 2 Sam. vi. 6 & seq. [m] Vide [n] Exod. xxv. 17.

(T) The word כפורת, Kaphoreth, indeed comes from the verb Caphar, which doth signify to expiate, to forgive, in a figurative sense, and in the primitive one, to cover, according to that of the psalmist——whose unrighteousness is forgiven, and whose sin is covered (6). But it would be absurd to infer from hence, that the word here signifies only a bare covering; especially when the apostle to the Hebrews, who in other cases has followed the version of the Septuagint, departs from it here, and calls it simply Ἱλαστήριον, the propitiatory, or mercy-seat (7), where they had rendered it Ἱλαστήριον ἐπίθεμα, the propitiatory lid or covering.

(6) Ps. xxxii. 1. (7) Hebr. ix. 5.

(V) We have had occaſion in another place to hint ſomething concerning the form of theſe cherubims; not that either theſe which Moſes ſpeaks of here, or thoſe which were embroidered on the vails and curtains, can help us to form any idea of them, except we have recourſe to other places of ſcripture, where they are ſomewhat more particularly deſcribed. The generality of interpreters, both antient and modern, have ſuppoſed them to have human ſhapes, becauſe Moſes ſays here, that they had their faces turned towards the mercy-ſeat; and elſewhere (8), that God ſet them with flaming ſwords, in their hands it is ſuppoſed, to guard the entrance of paradiſe. But this concludes nothing, becauſe face and hands, if any had here been mentioned, are attributed to beaſts, as well as men, in the Hebrew. The greateſt part of the Jews derive the word from another, which ſignifies, to be like a child, from which they conclude, that they were like young men naked, and covered only for decency with ſome of their wings (9). But it is certain, on the contrary, that the prophet Ezekiel repreſents them quite otherwiſe, and ſpeaks of the face of a cherubim as ſynonimous with that of an ox or calf, (10); according to which, the Apocalypſe calls them ζῶα, beaſts (11), and it is not improbable, that the

(8) Gen. iii. ver. ult. (9) Vide Kimc. & Buxtorf, ſub voc. Cherub. Baſnag. R. H. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 5, 6, & 7. paſſ. (10) Comp. Ezek. i. 10, & x. 14. (11) Apoc. iv. 6.

from which we may reaſonably conclude, that they were at leaſt in a kind of bowing poſture. This attitude, though not ſo clearly expreſſed by Moſes, may be further evinced, not only as it was the moſt decent and reſpectful, but as it ſeems to be alluded to by the pſalmiſt, who having declared, that God was ſeated between the cherubims, and expreſſed his majeſty, juſtice, and power in the two or three verſes following, adds, proſtrate yourſelves before his foot-ſtool [r]. Neither is it improbable, that what is ſaid of their looking down upon the mercy-ſeat, in a kind of admiring poſture, might give occaſion to that beautiful alluſion of St. Peter, when ſpeaking of the myſteries of our redemption, he ſays, which the very angels deſire to look into [s]. We might likewiſe give a very probable conjecture of their height, if it be allowed, that their wings, which met about the middle of the mercy-different deſcriptions we meet with of them, in ſeveral places of ſcripture, made Joſephus ſay, that they were a kind of winged creature, anſwering to the deſcription of that which Moſes ſaw about the throne of God, but to which no man had ever ſeen the like before (12).

[r] Pſ. xcix. 1, & ſeq. [s] 1 Pet. i. 12.

However, we think with many learned moderns (13), that the word is derived from Charab, which, in the Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic, ſignifies, to plow; according to which, Charub, or Cherub, doth often imply a ſtrong man, or beaſt; and as the ox is known to be very proper for agriculture, both on account of his ſtrength and docility, the authors above quoted have made no difficulty to believe, that the cherubims here ſpoken of reſembled them, if not in the whole, at leaſt in face and ſome other parts of the body. To theſe we may add the authority of an antient father, who believed, that the Egyptian Sphinx and other hieroglyphical beaſts were borrowed from thoſe of Moſes and Ezekiel (14). And indeed Moſes ſeems to hint at leaſt, that the cherub-work, which was embroidered on the vail and curtains within the holy of holies (15), was full of ſuch ſymbolical figures, after the manner of the famous Phrygian tapeſtry. Whether therefore theſe took the hint from Moſes, or he from them, is not very material; either ſuppoſition may be allowed without any harm. If the firſt, Moſes might thereby deſign to intimate the exiſtence and office of thoſe ſpiritual beings; and if the latter, it might ſerve to expoſe the folly of their Gentile worſhippers, ſeeing they were no more than ſervants to the God of Iſrael.

(12) Ant. lib. iii. c. 6. Le Clerc, Mede, & al.
(13) Grot. Bochart, Spencer, (14) Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. v.
(15) Exod. xxvi. 1.

ſeat,

ſeat, did bear the uſual proportion to the reſt of their bodies: but theſe enquiries are more curious than uſeful.

THE ark was a ſmall cheſt made of Shittim wood, and covered over with beaten gold. We have ſeen the dimenſions of its length and breadth, by thoſe of the mercy-ſeat; its height was equal to its breadth, that is, one cubit and half. It is called the ark of the covenant, and the ark of the teſtimony; the firſt, becauſe it was a ſymbol of the covenant made between God and his people, and contained the two tables of it, the pot of manna, and Aaron's miraculous rod which were depoſited in it, to be as ſo many witneſſes againſt every deviation of theirs. It had on each ſide two golden rings, through which were faſtened the two bars, by which it uſed to be carried on the prieſts ſhoulders. Theſe bars were made of the ſame wood with the ark, and like it overlaid with gold; and theſe were never to be taken off. The ark with its covering ſtood lengthwiſe, and not croſſwiſe, as ſome have imagined, in the midſt of the moſt holy place. Moſes doth not tell us, whether or no it had either feet or ſome pedeſtal to ſtand upon; and yet it is hardly to be ſuppoſed that it ſtood upon the bare ground.

SEVERAL learned rabbies have a notion, that there were two arks, the one made by Moſes, and the other by Bezaleel; becauſe Moſes is ſaid in one place to have made an ark of Shittim wood, into which he put the two tables of ſtone [t]; and in another place, that Bezaleel made an ark and covered it with gold [u]. But they might as well conclude, that Solomon built one temple, and his workmen another; however they add, that Moſes did always carry his own, and the prieſts the other; and that this latter, which had in it the book of the law, was always carried with them when they went to engage their enemies [w]. Abenezra endeavours to confirm this opinion, by what is ſaid in Joſhua of the diſtance that was to be kept between the people and it (the ark) [x]. He pretends, that the particle it is in the plural in the original, and that the words ſhould be tranſlated between you and them, that is, the two arks [y]. But, beſides that his criticiſm has no foundation, but on different readings of the Maſorites, and that grounded on the diſputed authority of the points; we have elſewhere ſeen, that the plural is ſometimes uſed to expreſs the excellency of a thing; ſo that we ſee no reaſon to ſuppoſe two arks from either of theſe arguments; and yet ſome Chriſtians have given into that opinion [z] (W).

[t] Deut. x. 3. [u] Exod. xxxvii. 1, 2. [w] NACHMAN, KIMCHI, ZACHUT, & al Vide BASNAG. ubi ſup. [x] Joſh. iii. 4. [y] ABENEZ. in Deut. x.

BESIDES the ark and mercy-ſeat, there was ſtill in this moſt holy place the volume of the law, which Moſes gave the Levites to depoſite by the ſide of the ark [a]: whether in the in or outſide is not agreed; but moſt probably without †. St. Paul omits this in the mention he makes of the things that were preſerved there [b]; for which no other reaſon can be given, than that it was ſufficiently known; for it is ſaid elſewhere, that there was nothing in the ark but the two tables of ſtone, which Moſes put into it at Horeb [c]; though it is plain, that the pot of manna and Aaron's miraculous rod were likewiſe preſerved in it. But we do not think, that either of theſe ſeeming inconſiſtencies, or the depoſiting of the ſacred volume, and the other holy utenſils, are matters of ſuch weight, as to deſerve all the pains which ſome learned authors have given themſelves to little purpoſe [d]. However, as to the book itſelf, we muſt not ſuppoſe, that it was the only copy, ſeeing it would not have been lawful for the high-prieſt to have fetched it out and in but on expiation-day; whereas the public reading of it was to be on the feaſt of tabernacles. We may therefore ſuppoſe with the Jews (X), that there were ſeveral copies of it, and that this prototype

[z] GOODW. & HOTTING. ubi ſup Diſſert. de Tabernacul. § 13.
[a] Deut. x. 2. † Vide PRID. Connect. part 1. lib. iii.
[b] Comp. 1 King. viii. 9. with Heb. ix. [c] 1 King. viii. 9.
[d] GOODW. ubi ſup. § 18, ad 24. 1 Sam. vi. & alib. vide PRID. ubi ſup.

(W) R. Kimchi adds, ſpeaking of theſe two arks, that the one had the pieces of the two tables which Moſes had broke, and the other thoſe which he made afterwards. And even the Talmudiſts, who do not ſeem to have dreamed of a double ark, are yet of opinion, that thoſe precious relics were preſerved in that one in which the new were repoſited. It is indeed ſcarce credible, that he left them ſcattered on the ground; but as he has not told us what he did with them, it is more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that he took them up into the mount, and there buried them out of ſight, than that he depoſited them in the ark, where they could be of no uſe, unleſs it were indeed to put them in mind of their abominable idolatry, which had occaſioned the breaking of them.

(X) They tell us, that there were thirteen copies of it, one for each tribe, and one to be preſerved in the ark. There is nothing improbable in all this; but there is one particularity they add, which is not quite ſo clear, namely, that, after the building of prototype was thus carefully preſerved to prevent the reſt from being corrupted. Laſtly, after the ark was brought back from the Philiſtines, they depoſited the little cheſt with the golden mice and emerods, not in it, but by the ſide of it [e].

THE utenſils in the holy place were, 1. The altar of incenſe. 2. The golden candleſtick. And 3. The table of ſhew-bread.

1. THE altar of perfume is ſometimes called the golden altar, becauſe, though it was made all of Shittim wood, yet it was ſo well covered over with gold, that it looked like a ſolid piece of it. It is alſo called the inner altar, to diſtinguiſh it from that of burnt-offerings, which ſtood without the tabernacle. Its uſe was twofold, namely, to burn incenſe morning and night, as we hinted elſewhere, and to be ſprinkled with the blood of the ſacrifices, which were offered for ſins of ignorance committed either by particular prieſts, or by all the people in general [f]. It was one cubit ſquare, and two cubits high, ſo that the ſmoke had ſtill eight cubits to aſcend. Two bars of the ſame wood covered with gold, and put through four gold rings, ſerved to carry it about, like the ark; only theſe might be taken off. There was a golden crown or ornament like an ogee round the top of it, and four horns on the four corners (Y), likewiſe covered with gold. The main difficulty of the temple, this laſt was taken out of the ſanctuary, and depoſited in the treaſury of the temple; and that it was this volume which was found there by the high-prieſt Hilkiah, in the reign of Joſiah (16). But if the latter be true, it is more likely, that it was taken out of the ſanctuary, and repoſited in ſome ſuch private place, to prevent its undergoing the ſame fate that all other copies had done, during the wicked reigns of Ammon and Manaſſes, than that it was removed thence in Solomon's time, without any neceſſity, or command from God.

(Y) It is ſcarce worth the while to enquire into the various notions which interpreters are run into about the ſhape of theſe horns; ſome making them to be round, and others ſquare knobs (17), others little plain, and others like twiſted, pyramids (18). What is worth obſerving to our Engliſh readers, is that the word קרן keren, ſignifies either a horn, or a ray of light, from which perhaps,

[e] 1 Sam. vi. & alib. [f] Vide Levit. iv. 3, & 7, 13, & 18.

(16) 2 King. xxii. 8, & ſeq. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14, & ſeq. Vide Kimch. in loc. & Baſnag. ubi ſup. c. 8. (17) N. de Lyra, poſt Rabbin. aliq. (18) Villalpand, Arr. Montan. & al.

culty is how to understand what is meant by the top or roof of it [g], and how it could be ordered so as to bear the heat of the burning coals, without burning the wood through the gold that overlaid it. This has induced St. Jerom and others to translate it a grate, through which the small coals and ashes fell to the bottom [h], but the construction of the altar is incompatible with it. Josephus calls it a golden fire-hearth, which is equally liable to the same inconvenience, unless we suppose it to have been of more than common thickness.

Altar of perfume.

The difficulty is still greater with respect to the altar of burnt-offerings, which though made of the same wood, and only covered with copper, did yet bear a much more intense heat, by reason of the great number of victims, which were burnt constantly upon it. Le Clerc hath offered two ways of solving this difficulty, either by supposing the metal that covered it to be very thick, or that the Shittim was the same with the Larix of Vitruvius, which was an incombustible wood [i]; and, because he found the first solution to be insufficient, he published a short dissertation to prove the probability of the latter [k]: but the misfortune is, that we have no sufficient testimony, that any such wood did grow in the neighbourhood of Sinai, or indeed in Arabia. We shall speak of the latter altar by and by; as for this of incense, Cunæus seems to have found out the best expedient out of the Jewish rabbies, by supposing, that the burning coals were not set upon the altar itself, but upon a censer like a chasing-dish; which conjecture he backs by a text or two where such censers are commanded to be filled with coals, and set upon the altar [l]. However, if the readers should scruple to admit haps, as Cunæus observes, those rays which shone about Moses's face may easily have been transformed into horns, so that these on the corners of the altar might, for ought appears to the contrary, be nothing else but ornaments resembling in some measure the rays of the sun. However, those who think them to have been in shape like the horns of an ox or ram, may as probably guess right, since any of these forms might answer the purpose for which they seem intended, namely, for the greater ease and steadiness in moving and carrying the altar about, and the tying of the victims to them, according to the allusion of the psalmist (19).

[g] Exod. xxx. 3. [h] Chald. Paraphr. FAGIUS in loc. [i] Comm. in Exod. in loc. [k] Bibliot. Choisie, tom. xii. p. 57. & seq.. [l] Comp. Levit. x. 1. xvi. 12. Num. xvi. 6, 7.

(19) Ps. cxviii. 27.

of

of theſe, it is but ſuppoſing, that this golden top or roof, with its crown or frame, was ſo fixed, as to be at ſome ſmall diſtance above the altar itſelf, and the wood will be out of danger of being burnt, though it had not been overlaid with gold, becauſe the heat naturally aſcends. The ſituation of it is not clear in the text, which ſays, that it was to ſtand before the vail [m]. Joſephus, who is univerſally followed, places it between the candleſtick and the table of ſhew-bread [n]. We cannot contradict it, and yet we think, that if the candleſtick were placed in the midſt, which is the propereſt place for it, and the other two, which were near of the ſame form, height, and bigneſs, put on each ſide, and at a little diſtance between it and the ſides of the tabernacle, it would be more agreeable to the rules of ſymmetry. The author of the ſecond book of Maccabees tells us that Jeremiah, ſeeing the captivity approaching, took this altar and the ark of God to mount Nebo, and hid them in a cave there, and ſtopt the door ſo cloſe, that it could not afterwards be found [o]. The Talmudiſts gave a different account of it, namely, that Joſiah, having been admoniſhed by ſome prophets, that all the precious veſſels of the ſanctuary would be carried away to Babylon, depoſited the holy fire, the ark, the pot of manna, Aaron's rod, and the breaſt-plate of Urim, and this altar of incenſe, in a ſubterraneous place, which Solomon, from the ſame forecaſt, had cauſed to be built with ſuch extreme care and privacy, that, at the return from the captivity, they could never be found, nor ever will be, if we believe the Jews, till the coming of the Meſſiah. One thing indeed ſeems reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that if they had been carried into Babylon, with the reſt of the ſacred utenſils of the temple, they would have been alſo reſtored to them; but we find on the contrary, that they were forced to make them new ones at their return, whatever became of the old [p].

2. THE candleſtick was by far the richeſt piece in the whole ſanctuary, ſeeing it weighed a talent, not the common, but that of the ſanctuary; and was made from top to bottom of pure beaten gold, all of a piece, without joint or ſolder [q]. Its baſe or foot, or, as the original words it, its thigh, becauſe it probably reſembled an inverted one, had a trunk over it, out of which proceeded ſix branches, three on each ſide, and this laſt made the ſeventh in the middle. Theſe Candleſtick branches

[m] Exod. xxx. 6. [n] Ant. lib. iii c. 6. ad fin. [o] Ch. ii. 1, & ſeq. [p] Vide BUXTORF de Arc. c. 21, 22. R. JACKUT. PRID. CONN. part 1. lib. iii. CUNÆ. BASNAG. & al. [q] Exod. xxv. 3, & ſeq.

branches were adorned with cups, knops, and flowers, alternate and equidistant, and on the top of each was fixed a lamp, shaped like an almond, which might be taken on or off, as occasion served [r], and in them were put the oil and the wick or cotton. These had their tongs or snuffers to draw the cotton in or out, and snuff-dishes to receive the sparks and filth that fell from the lamps. All these were of pure gold also. It was the priest's business in waiting every evening, at the time of incense, to go in and light them, and about the same time in the morning to put them out, to clean, and replenish them [s] (Z). As to the height of it Moses has not mentioned any thing about it; so that whilst some have lowered it to the level of the altar of incense, which would have cast but an imperfect light, especially on the table of shew-bread, where the loaves stood one upon another, others have carried it up to the height of five cubits, which is a worse extreme, since it must not only have required a ladder or steps to have reached it, but it being the half of the height of the place, the smoke of it would soon have sullied and spoiled the rich curtains over head: It is therefore more reasonable to suppose it of such a height that a [r] Compare Exod. xxv. 37, with Num. iv. 9. [s] Comp. ver. 16, with Exod. xxx. 8. Levit. xxiv. 2. 1 Sam. iii. 3.

(Z) Notwithstanding those texts we have quoted above, to prove that the lamps burned only in the night, some have stuck so close to the letter, where it is said elsewhere, that they shall burn continually (20), that they have affirmed them to burn all the day also. Josephus, as if he had been minded to split the difference, tells us, that three of them burned all day, and the other four were lighted against night *. But if we must suppose, without any occasion, that any burned in the day, it were more reasonable to think, it was the middle one, which being more capacious than the rest, may be concluded to have burned so much the longer accordingly. However, seeing that the sanctuary opened to the sun-rising, we can see no occasion for such a supposition, against so many plain texts. But Josephus has added some other particulars, which it would be hard to guess where he had them, such as that the knops, cups, flowers, &c. in the candlestick amounted to seventy in all (21). Whereas those who will be at the pains to tell them after Moses will find but about fifty eight; that is, eighteen cups, eighteen flowers, and eighteen knops, to the six side branches, and four to the middle one. Of the same kind is what he tells us there, that the seven branches answered to the seven planets; that the candlestick stood stooping, and such like, not worth a further enquiry.

(20) Exod xxvii 20, & alib. * Ant. lib. iii. c. 8. (21) Ibid. c. 7, ad fin.

man

man might eaſily reach the top of it, that is, about ſix foot high. We are likewiſe left to gueſs at its ſhape, breadth, ſituation, and ſeveral other particulars, in which every commentator thinks he has hit better than any other of his brethren [t]; for which reaſon we ſhall follow them no farther in the dark (A); but only add, that after the building of the temple, Solomon, inſtead of one, placed ten candleſticks in the holy place, all of the ſame metal, with their other appurtenances [u]; but whether that of Moſes was one of the number, or made the eleventh, is not certain; the latter ſeems the more probable of the two, becauſe the holy place here being conſiderably larger than that of the tabernacle; and all the veſſels being made ſo accordingly; it is likely, that the candleſticks did bear the ſame proportion; in which caſe the old one would not have been uniform with the reſt. But whether it was new-caſt, or repoſited in the treaſury of the temple, or what became of it, is uncertain.

3. THE table of ſhew-bread. We have ſpoken of the bread elſewhere; as for the table on which it was ſet, it was made of the ſame wood, and covered with gold, like the ark: it was two cubits long, one cubit broad, and one and half high: it had a golden border or crown, which may be ſuppoſed to be a kind of rim round it, like that of our tea-tables [w]. It was alſo of pure gold, and might have an ogee or ſome ſuch ornament about it. It ſtood upon four feet, which Joſephus ſaid re-

Table of ſhew-bread

[t] Vide inter al. JOSEPH. ubi ſup. HIERON. ARR. MONT. VILLALP. CUN. BASNAG. VILLET. & al. [u] 1 Kings vii. 49. 2 Chron. iv. 7. [w] Exod. xxv. 23, & ſeq.

(A) It may not, however, be amiſs here to ſay ſomething of the oil that entertained theſe lamps; and this, the text tells us, was to be the pureſt virgin oil of olives, with which the land of Canaan abounded very much, as we have ſeen heretofore †; and indeed, none but ſuch would have been fit to burn in that place, where the furniture was ſo exquiſitely rich. We may remember, that when Moſes exacted a free-will-offering from the people, of all their coſtly ſpoils; oil was one of the things of that number; ſince then there was always a certain quantity required with their other ſacrifices, beſides tithes and the free-offerings of the devouter ſort, there could not be wanting a conſtant ſupply of it for this purpoſe. The Babyloniſh Talmud aſſures us, that, after the extruction of Solomon's temple, there was a place, by the women's apartment, appropriated for the keeping of it (22).

† See Vol. II. p. 446. note (N). (22) Tract. Middoth.

ſembled in part thoſe that were uſed in the Dorians beds [x]; but what he meant by it is not worth our enquiry. Moſes ſeems to intimate in another verſe [y] ſomething like a ſecond crown or rim, though ſome take it to be the ſame with the former, but it is more likely, that it was a lower one, which went round the four feet near the bottom, and kept them ſteady. To the upper rim were faſtened four gold rings, two on each ſide, through which the bars were put that ſerved for its carriage. On the top there were, beſides the two rows of ſhew-loaves, ſome pans, or chafing-diſhes of gold, in which the incenſe uſed to be burnt, with ſeveral other ſmaller utenſils, which ſerved for inferior uſes in this holy place [z], which we ſhall not dwell longer upon, becauſe there are almoſt as many different opinions about the ſignifications of their names, their forms, and uſes, as there are interpreters. This table was afterwards changed for another by Solomon [a]. Joſephus tells us [b], that it was larger than the old one, probably to anſwer the largeneſs of the place. The author of the book of Chronicles adds, that he made ten more, five on the north, and five on the ſouth ſide of the holy place, which ſerved to ſet all the other utenſils upon [c]; and Joſephus ſays, that there were as many more of different makes and ſizes, as ſerved to hold twenty thouſand cups, and other veſſels of gold, and twice that number of ſilver ones [d].

Court of the tabernacle.

4. THE court of the tabernacle, with its utenſils, is the laſt thing we have to ſpeak of. The court was an oblong ſquare, an hundred cubits long, and fifty broad (B), incloſed on all but the eaſt ſide, which had an opening of twenty cubits, [x] Ant. lib. iii. c. 6. [y] Exod. xxv. 26. [z] Ibid. ver. 29, & alib. paſſ. [a] 1 Kings vii. 48, & ſeq. [b] Ant. lib. viii. c. 2. [c] 2 Chron. iv. 8. [d] Ubi ſupr.

(B) This חָצֵר, Chatzer, or court, being mentioned in ſome places, eſpecially by the pſalmiſt (23), in the plural number, has induced ſome interpreters to ſuppoſe, without any reaſon, that there were two of them (24), one for the Levites, and the other for the people: but as Moſes doth hint nothing like it, and we have obſerved already, that the plural is often uſed to denote the excellency of a thing, we ſee no ground for ſuch a ſuppoſition, nor indeed for looking upon theſe expreſſions as prophetical of the three courts which Solomon made to the temple; viz. one for the Levites, one for the Iſraelites, and the laſt for the Gentiles, as ſome authors have done (25).

(23) Vide Pſ. lxv. 4, & lxxxiv. 2, & 4, & alib. (24) Vide Calvin. in loc. (25) Vide Cun. & Baſnag. ubi ſup. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 6.

bits,

bits, for the prieſts and Levites, and people to go in and out with their offerings. This incloſure was not deſigned to conceal what was done in the court, ſince the curtains, that ſurrounded it, were made of a kind of net or point-work, through which even the heathens might have a view of it. Theſe curtains, which Moſes therefore calls by a particular name (C), to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe of the tabernacle, whoſe uſe was of a different nature, were ſupported by four flights of pillars, probably of ſhittim wood (D), with braſs pedeſtals or ſockets; and adorned with ſilver fillets, or rather chapiters, for ſuch they were [e]. As for their height, as Moſes has ſaid nothing

[e] Vide Exod. xxxviii. 28.

(C) The word here uſed is קלע, Kelah, which ſignifies either a ſling, or a net, or open work (26), probably becauſe thoſe ſlings, with which they ſlung their ſtones, had the bottom made of ſome ſuch kind of open work. For this reaſon the Chaldee paraphraſt tranſlates it grate or crib-work, in which he is followed by the generality of Chriſtian interpreters (27). Some indeed pretend it was a flouriſhing of all ſorts of leaf and flower-work (28), but they all agree, that the ground was open and tranſparent, ſo that theſe hangings might in ſome meaſure reſemble a piece of point or lace.

The Jews tell us, however, that after the tabernacle was fixed in Shiloh, they ſurrounded it with a good ſtrong wall of the ſame dimenſion: but whether this had any apertures or not, doth not appear. Sure it is, that theſe courts were in uſe, and eſteemed as a piece of grandeur, in the earlieſt times, both among the Egyptians and other nations, and that not only their temples, but their palaces, were ſurrounded with one or more of them, either to obſtruct the ſight, or the approach of the people.

(D) As Moſes makes no mention of any wood, but only of ſilver and braſs, Joſephus (29) and the old latin verſion have ſuppoſed thoſe pillars to have been made of this laſt metal. But beſides that there is no likelihood that they ſhould have added ſuch a monſtrous weight, as fifty ſix ſuch columns muſt have been, to all their other carriage, it is plain, Moſes mentions nothing like it, where he ſpeaks of all the other utenſils made of braſs (30), which he would hardly have omitted. However, leſt this ſhould not prove ſufficient to confute that notion, a late author has been at the pains of computing all the braſs that was uſed in the tabernacle, to prove, that there would not have been a ſufficient quantity for other utenſils, had theſe pillars been made of it (31). There is, however, ſome diffi-nothing of it, authors have conjectured it variously, from ten to five cubits; but as the design of them was only to support the curtains, and to hinder the approach, and not the view, of the tabernacle; the last seems the most rational, it being the height that Josephus assigns them, as well as that of the curtains; only we may reasonably suppose, that the silver chapiters did rise above the curtain. We are likewise left to guess at their figure, only a square one may be reasonably supposed fitter, both for carriage and for holding the hangings tight, than a round one. They were fifty six in number, twenty on each side, ten at the west, and six at the east end, besides those which supported the blue curtain which covered the entrance of the court, which was of a fine sky-blue flourished, and was made to draw on either side, or to lift up; the text doth not say which, but the Jews believe the latter [f].

(26) Vide Buxtorf. Theſ. & Arr. Montan. ſub voc. קלע. (27) R. Sal. Jark. Vide Munſt. Jun. Oleaſt. & al. (28) Kimch. in Rad. & al. (29) Ant. lib. iii. c. 6. Vide & Raſcius in loc. (30) Exod. xxxviii. 29, & ſeq. (31) Vide Baſnag. ubi ſup.

THUS the whole court had a circuit of three hundred cubits. Those therefore who suppose, that the curtain that surrounded it, was one entire piece, seem not to consider, what a laborious task it would have been to the Gershonites to have folded or rolled it up; besides that, the text speaking all along of them in the plural number, shews that there were more than one or two [g]. However, though this court bore the same proportion with the tabernacle, and the four sides ran parallel to it, yet is not the tabernacle to be supposed to have stood in the centre of it. There was no necessity for the Area on the west end to be of the same extent with that on the east, because we do not read of any considerable utensils placed in that; whereas this latter had the altar of burnt-offering, the layer, and several other things, of which we are going now to speak; so that though Moses has not left us the dimensions of either, this last is supposed to have been of equal length with its breadth, that is, fifty foot square; and indeed less than that space could hardly suffice for all the work that was done there, and the multitude of utensils that were used in it, since it was the only place in which all the victims were slain, and both they, and all other kind of offerings, were brought and offered up. For this reason it is disputed, both among culty in adjusting the equidistance of these pillars, so as to bring the whole to the length and breadth assigned by Moses; and which cannot be otherwise removed, than by supposing, that those that were at the end of the four sides did come almost close to one another at each angle (32).

[f] Ibid. xxvii. 9, ad fin. [g] Ibid. ver. 9, 10, 12, &seq.

(32) Basnag. ibid. Vide Munst. Jun. Calm. & al. in loc.

the

the Jews and Chriſtians, whether the people, who came thither with the victims, were ſuffered to enter into it, in order to lay their hands on their heads, and to ſtay the whole time of the ceremony, as the letter of the law ſeems to require; or whether they were not met by the prieſts or Levites, at the entrance into the court, and having performed the part of the impoſition of hands and confeſſion there, did go to behold the remainder of it from the openings of the incloſure. If the former be admitted, it muſt be owned, that they muſt have been very much crowded at ſome particular times, or been forced to admit no more at one time than the place would conveniently hold. We need not to add, that the braſs ſtakes and cordages which were ranged all around, within as well as without, in order to ſecure both the court and tabernacle from ſtorms and winds, did ſtill ſtreighten the place conſiderably. There have been alſo various conjectures concerning the reaſon of its ſituation and facing of the weſt, which we ſhall not dwell upon: the beſt we meet with from the Jews is, that it was done in oppoſition to the Heathen, who worſhipped towards the riſing ſun. As for the myſtical interpretations of ſome Chriſtian divines, they are out of our province.

Altar of burnt-offering.

THE altar of burnt-offering was placed, as we have obſerved before, at the eaſt end of the court, and one may ſuppoſe it to have ſtood at ſuch a convenient diſtance from the tabernacle, that neither the ſmoke of its conſtant fire, nor that of the victims which were burned upon it, might fall upon, or damage, its outward vail. This altar is alſo called the outward, to diſtinguiſh it from that of incenſe, which was within the ſanctuary. We have already taken notice, that it was made of ſhittim wood, and covered over with braſs. It was five cubits ſquare and three cubits high, and becauſe it was portable like the other, it had four braſs rings, through which the two bars were put, by which it was carried upon the prieſts ſhoulders. It had four horns at the four corners of the ſame wood, and covered with the ſame metal, but whoſe ſhape is equally uncertain with that of the other altar. In the cavity of it, which probably went through, and may be ſuppoſed as capacious as the bigneſs of the altar will admit, was hung by four braſs rings a croſs-bar grate, which reached down to the middle of the cavity, and through which the aſhes fell. This was to be placed under that part which is generally rendered the compaſs (E) of the altar [h], but is variouſly underſtood, [h] Exod. xxvii. 1, & ſeq.

(E) The word כַּרְכֹּב. Carcob, is one of thoſe that occur but once in the ſcriptures, and whoſe meaning muſt remain uncertain for underſtood, or rather fancied, in order to ſave the wood from being conſumed within the copper work. We ſhall content ourſelves with giving our readers the moſt probable and approved conjecture, which is that of the author of the Diſſertations upon the Pentateuch [i]. He ſuppoſes the cavity of the altar to have been about ſeven feet and half wide, from ſide to ſide, and the ſhittim wood to have been covered with braſs, within as well as without. The croſs-bar grate he ſuppoſes to have been a veſſel, made in the moſt convenient form to receive and keep up the fire, which was conſtantly ſupplied with freſh wood; and to have been hung about a foot deep within the cavity. As for the Carcob, which we render the compaſs or circuit, he thinks that it was another copper veſſel, whoſe form he leaves to the diſcretion of the reader, capacious enough to contain the fleſh of the victims, which were to be conſumed upon, or in it. This veſſel being likewiſe ſuſpended by four braſs rings over the grate, at a convenient diſtance, was conſequently ſurrounded by the continual flames from below, and might conſume all that was in it in a very little time, without endangering the wood of which the altar was made; and both the Carcob and the grate being thus ſuſpended, might be eaſily taken on and off, whenever the altar was to be cleared or tranſported. Thus far our author: the reader may ſee his reaſons for theſe ſuppoſitions in the original. The only thing that can be objected againſt this ſuppoſition is, that there are ſome expreſs texts, which enjoin the victims, with the head and the fat, to be laid, not over, but upon the for want of parallels to fix it. The Jews, inſtead of helping us in ſuch doubtful caſes, do rather embroil them the more. R. Salomon, and after him, the learned De Lyra believed it to have been only a kind of ornament, that ſurrounded the altar; and other rabbies, who affirm, contrary to the text, that the altar was ten cubits high, and large in proportion, tell us, that it was a kind of gallery, upon which the prieſts were forced to mount, in order to lay the wood and victims in due order, and that the three cubits which Moſes aſſigns to the height of the altar, muſt be reckoned from that gallery and upwards. But what quite confutes this wild notion is, that Moſes ſays, this Carcob was to reach to the middle of the altar. If therefore the altar was ten cubits high, there muſt have been five cubits above, as well as five below this imaginary gallery, as Cunæus juſtly obſerves. Our commentators have therefore juſtly rejected them, and endeavoured to remove the main difficulty, without departing from the original, or giving into fabulous traditions.

[i] SAURIN Diſcours ſur le Pentat. Diſc. liv.

wood,

wood, or upon the fire, which is upon, not within, the altar [k]. This ſeems alſo to have been the practice of the antient patriarchs before the Moſaic inſtitution. So that this Carcob ſeems rather to have contained the fire, if it was really a diſtinct thing from the grate. As for what is ſaid of this latter hanging in the middle, it may more reaſonably be underſtood of the middle with reſpect to its ſides, than its height. Since therefore invention muſt ſupply the obſcurity of the text, as our author obſerves, may we not as well ſuppoſe this Carcob to have been a kind of cincture to the grate, capacious enough to contain both the wood and the victims, and to have been ſuſpended ſo near the level of the altar, and at ſo convenient a diſtance from the inſides of it, as not to heat the braſs of it to a degree ſufficient to burn the wood incloſed in it; whilſt the crib might be a kind of bottom to it, ſerving to give it air from beneath, and to let out the aſhes and other ſmall rubbiſh, which might otherwiſe clog the fire? We may even venture to add, that the whole might be ſo artificially contrived, the fleſh being thus embraced on all ſides by a fierce and conſtant fire, and this by the circumambient air, as might concenter the heat to ſuch a degree as to conſume every particle, and yet be entirely free from that offenſive ſmell, which ſuch quantities of fleſh and fat muſt have neceſſarily cauſed (F). But this we ſubmit to our readers. The truth is, that a man

[k] Levit. i. 8.

(F) As a confirmation of what we have advanced, we beg leave to aſſure our readers, that we have ſeen in France a kind of portable hearth, not unlike a chafing-diſh, ſo artfully contrived, that the fire within it, tho' nót very fierce to outward appearance, did conſume feathers, brimſtone, and other like fetid materials, without caſting the leaſt ſmell, or indeed any heat, beyond the narrow boundaries of its focus. As this curious piece was expoſed to public view by the owner, for a ſmall piece of money, at Paris and ſeveral other parts of France, we doubt not, but it has been ſeen by many of our curious countrymen, who may confirm the truth of what we ſay. However, if the reader think much of admitting the parallel, we beg leave to add, with reſpect to theſe two altars, that as that of incenſe was over laid with gold, in order to anſwer the reſt of the rich utenſils of the ſanctuary, ſo this of burnt-offering was covered with braſs, becauſe all the other materials of the court were made of that metal; rather than barely to preſerve the wood under it from the fire. The ſhittim therefore might be deſigned only as the mould or model of the altars, and to avoid either the exceſſive coſt, or a man ought to have ſeen and examined the whole ſtructure of the tabernacle and its apparatus, to be able to remove every difficulty, that may be raiſed by the curious. But do we not find the ſame with reſpect to Greek and Roman antiquities, though we are better acquainted with thoſe languages, and have ſuch multitudes of antient authors to conſult, in compariſon of thoſe few that relate to the Jewiſh? It was on this altar, that the ſacred fire, which deſcended from heaven at the conſecration of the tabernacle, was to be continually kept. If it be aſked, how this could be done in their marches, when this and all other utenſils were wrapped up in ſeveral coverings, the uppermoſt of which was of badger-ſkins, without either burning thoſe coverings, or extinguiſhing the fire; we need not to have recourſe to miracles, as the rabbies do here and every where elſe (G). We may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that the or weight of maſſive ones: ſo that whether we ſuppoſe it to have been incombuſtible or not, the end was ſtill anſwered, ſince even upon the latter ſuppoſition, that of gold was out of danger, becauſe the fire was ſet upon it in a ſeparate golden veſſel or cenſer, and this of copper might either be ſo contrived as to ſave the wood, or if that ſhould be burnt to a coal, the metal may be ſuppoſed ſtrong enough to ſtand without it.

(G) It is by the ſame miraculous power that they pretend it was preſerved againſt violent winds and rains, to which the altar was expoſed, by ſtanding in ſuch an open place; but we may more reaſonably ſuppoſe, that they took proper means to ſhelter it from both, ſuch as Moſes might leave to their diſcretion. As for the wood that entertained this fire, they tell us, that it was not to be ſuch as had ſerved to any other purpoſe; that it was not to be canker or worm-eaten, and the like; and that after the Nethinims had made it ready for uſe, it was the buſineſs of thoſe prieſts, who were diſabled from officiating at the altar, to examine it after them, and to throw aſide all that they found any ſuch defects in. As for this ſacred fire, we need not to tell our readers how early it was in uſe among the Chaldeans and Perſians, from whom it paſſed to the Greeks, Romans, and other nations. It was called in the old Perſic, Oriſmada, which ſome critics pretend to be derived from the Hebrew words, urim eſh yah, light and fire of God, or from or eſh men yah, light and fire from God; and from thence infer, that they had this cuſtom from the Jews †, but that is what we dare not venture to warrant. As for the Jewiſh one, we read in the Maccabees (33), that, at the approach

† Baſnag. R. H. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 14. (33) 2 Macc. i. 19. & ſeq. ii. 1, & ſeq.

of

the Carcob, or veſſel which held the fire, and was to be taken off when they removed, was carried in ſuch a manner, as to preſerve fire enough to kindle a greater one, when occaſion required, as on the morning and evening ſacrifice. The reader, however, muſt be reminded here, not to confound this Moſaic altar, with that ſpacious one which was afterwards reared by Solomon, of which this is not a proper place to ſpeak. One common caution however belonged to theſe and all other altars (H), that the aſcent to them was to be gradual, and not by ſteps, to prevent all indecency in God's worſhip [1].

THE

[1] Exod. xx. ult.

of Nebuchadnezzar towards Jeruſalem, the prophet Jeremiah, with ſome other prieſts, took it from the altar, and went and hid it in the bottom of a dry well, and that at the return from the captivity Nehemiah ſent ſome of their grand children to the well, who brought him ſome dirty water inſtead of fire, but, upon his pouring it upon the altar, it immediately blazed into a clear flame, which was kept afterwards till the deſtruction of the ſecond temple. This ſtory is likewiſe apocryphal, but the Jews believe it, only they compare this ſecond fire to a dog, whereas the firſt, they ſay, was like a lion (34).

(H) As we are upon the ſubject of the divine laws, by whoſe directions all theſe things were made, we muſt by no means forget that altar which God enjoined to be made to him, either of earth or of rough ſtones, in all places where he ſhould record his name (35). Whoever compares theſe words with the command of building the brazen altar, might be apt to think, that the Iſraelites were left at their liberty to offer up their ſacrifices either upon the one or the other, as they liked beſt; and yet we find a ſevere prohibition againſt ſacrificing any where but at this latter, and in the court of the tabernacle (36). To reconcile this ſeeming contravention, ſome have conjectured, that this brazen altar was filled with earth and rough ſtones, but what we have ſaid above doth ſufficiently confute ſuch a ſuppoſition. We paſs by ſeveral others equally crude to come at the moſt rational. There ſeems indeed a manifeſt difference between the laws relating to thoſe two altars; that of the one, viz. the brazen one, confined it to the ceremonial part, in which the prieſts alone were allowed to officiate; whereas the other related properly to extraordinary caſes, when ſome holy perſons were commanded by God to offer ſome kind of ſacrifices, without any regard to the tribes they were of; upon all which occaſions they were obliged to rear ſuch a plain altar, as is above deſcribed.

(34) R. Zaccuth, ubi ſup. (35) Exod. xx. 24. (36) Levit. xvii. 3, 4. Vide Balmag. ubi ſup. c. 14.

The great laver.

THE brazen laver is the laſt conſiderable utenſil that was in the court of the tabernacle. It was conveniently ſituate between the eaſt end of it and the altar of burnt-offerings. Its ſhape and capaciouſneſs, not being mentioned by Moſes, we can affirm nothing certain about them. Its uſe was twofold. Firſt, it ſerved for the prieſts to waſh their hands and feet, who were expreſly forbid, under ſevere penalties, to preſume upon any part of their function till they had performed that ceremony [m]. Secondly, to waſh the entrails and legs of the victims [n]. Some Jews fancy, that there was another reſervoir of water for this laſt uſe [o], which is not improbable, not only as it was more decent, but becauſe we find it ſo ordered in Solomon's temple, where the brazen ſea was for the ſole waſhing of the prieſts, whilſt there were ten other lavers beſides for the waſhing of the victims [p]. If this was not the caſe here, we muſt ſuppoſe, that they only took the water out of the laver into ſome other veſſel to waſh thoſe entrails in,

[m] Exod. xxx. 20. [n] Vide Levit. xix. [o] Vide KIMCH. in loc. [p] 2 Chron. iv. 6.

The only thing that can be objected againſt this ſolution is, that the words, thou ſhalt build me an altar of earth——in every place where I record my name, &c. ſeem rather to imply a fixed, than ſuch an occaſional, altar. But the Chaldee paraphraſt has given us a truer ſenſe of theſe words, as all who underſtand the original will eaſily own; which is this. In every place where I cauſe, or command my name to be recorded or celebrated, &c. The meaning of which is plainly this, by comparing both places together: it ſhall not be lawful for you to offer your ſacrifices whereſoever your fancy leads you, but only at the court of my tabernacle: nevertheleſs, whenever I cauſe my name to be celebrated upon any particular occaſion, in what place ſoever I command my ſervants to ſacrifice unto me, there ſhall they rear me an altar of earth, &c. and there I will meet and bleſs them; but this ſhall not be done without an expreſs command from me. This natural interpretation was not only verified by the ſequel, as appears from all the inſtances we have of theſe extraordinary ſacrifices, but doth likewiſe account for the reaſon of God's chooſing a plain and artleſs altar upon all ſuch occaſions; about which both Jews and Chriſtians have racked their brains to little purpoſe. For had they been more elaborate and laſting, the Iſraelites, too prone to ſuperſtition, would have been in all probability induced to fancy a more than ordinary ſanctity in them, and ſo have gone a whoring after them, contrary to God's expreſs prohibition; whereas their being reared up juſt to ſerve the preſent exigence, and then being immediately pulled, or falling down in courſe, could not adminiſter any ſuch temptation.

for

for it was not even lawful for a prieſt to waſh his hands and feet in the ſame water. For this reaſon they ſuppoſe, that this laver had a quantity of cocks, at which the water was ſet to run upon their feet firſt, and then upon their hands, and was received into a baſon underneath [q], This fountain was to be kept continually repleniſhed with water, and this office belonged to the Levites [r], unleſs they made perhaps the Nethinims bring it to them to the entrance of the court. Moſes tells us in another chapter, that this braſs laver and its foot was made of the looking-glaſſes of the women, that came in crowds to the door of the tabernacle [s], which has given ground for various ſpeculations; and ſome interpreters have even ventured to turn the braſs there mentioned into ſteel [t]: as if thoſe antient mirrours had been made of no other metal. For our part, we take it for granted, that they were made of other metals alſo, ſuch as braſs, tin, ſilver, and the like, and ſome with braſs mixed with tin or ſilver; the laſt of which, Pliny tells us [u], were the moſt eſteemed; but we are apt to think, that there is an error crept into the text, or an exchange of one letter for another like it, and that it ſhould be rendered, he made the laver and its foot of a braſs, like unto the looking-glaſſes of the women that crowd about the door of the tabernacle, by which is meant, that he made them either of the ſame metal, or that he gave them the ſame degree of brightneſs and ſmoothneſs (I). And if what an antient father tells

[q] Miſhn. ap. ARR. MONTAN. in loc. [r] Vide N. DE LYRA in loc. [s] Exod. xxxviii. 8. [t] Vide TREMEL. in loc. [u] Lib. xxxiii. c. 9.

(I) Thoſe who underſtand the original know, that it is far from improbable, that ב beth may have ſlipt in here inſtead of the כ caph, by reaſon of their likeneſs; eſpecially if they remember, that the former is never uſed, that we can recollect, to expreſs the metal or ſtuff of which a thing is made; ſo that this letter is here altogether irregular; whereas the כ, which ſignifies as, like unto, according to, gives a good ſenſe to the phraſe. However, the rabbies, taking it in the other ſenſe, have made it a great piece of merit in thoſe devout women, who, according to them, were filled with ſuch a zeal for the ſervice of God, that they came in ſhoals to the tabernacle, to ſacrifice the moſt precious ornament of their toilet to holy uſes, reſolved for the future to neglect all outward adorning, that they might take more care of the inward. Thoſe interpreters who have fancied them to be real glaſſes framed in braſs, and to have been fixed round the laver that the prieſts might ſee themſelves in them, ſeem ſtill more out of the way, ſince they came thither to waſh only their hands and feet, which they could do without the help of a glaſs.

us be true of the Egyptian women [w], that they uſed to go to the temple with a looking-glaſs in one hand, and a timbrel in the other, it will ſtill give us a greater light into the meaning of the Hebrew women wearing ſuch an ornament when they came to the tabernacle. As for what is ſaid of their repairing thither in crowds, it was no more than what they uſually did, as appears from other places of ſcripture [x].

To theſe we might add a multitude of other furniture ſubſervient to other uſes, ſuch as kettles, pans, frying-pans, ovens, ſhovels, tongs, pick-axes, hatchets, cleavers, knives, forks, tables, tubs, trays, diſhes, and many more; all of which were either made of braſs, or of wood covered with it; but it is ſufficient to have named the moſt conſiderable of them. We ſhall only add, that the charge of all theſe was committed, the moſt ſacred ones to the prieſts, and the reſt to the Levites, whoſe buſineſs it was to pack and cover them up with proper cloths and ſkins, made for that purpoſe, whenever they removed. It is obſervable, however, that in all this account we find no mention made of any pavement or flooring, ſo much as for the tabernacle, and yet it is hardly credible, as was obſerved before, that its rich and ſacred utenſils ſhould ſtand on the bare ground. We may therefore ſuppoſe, that Moſes has barely mentioned all that was done before the ſetting up of the tabernacle. And if we conſider their vaſt number and variety, the richneſs and curious workmanſhip of a great part of them, and the little time the whole was finiſhed in, not much above five months [y], we ſhall have cauſe to wonder at their diſpatch, unleſs we ſuppoſe a vaſt number of hands to have been employed in it; but this need not hinder us from ſuppoſing, that Moſes might add many others, as he ſaw needful in proceſs of time, among which this flooring might be one.

THESE are the principal laws relating to the worſhip of God, or, as they are commonly called, of the firſt table; but before we paſs on to thoſe of the ſecond, it will be neceſſary to ſay ſomething of thoſe which related to their proſelytes (K). There was an expreſs command of

[w] CYRIL. ALEXAND. de Adorat. in ſpirit. lib. ii. ap. CALM. ſub voc. Miroir. [x] Vide 1 Sam. ii 22, & alib. [y] Ita Judæi. Vide Sedar Olam. MUNST. CUN. USSER. Ann. p. 16, & al.

(K) The text diſtinguiſhes them only by the words גר, ger, a traveller, or ſojourner, and נכר, Necher, a ſtranger or alien. However, we may make a threefold diſtinction of them, namely, of ſuch as continued ſtill in their idolatry and religion of their fathers; ſuch as of God, that if any ſtranger was deſirous to be admitted to eat of the paſſover, he was firſt to be circumciſed, after which he was to be admitted, not only to that grand ſolemnity, but to all the other religious privileges, in common with the Iſraelites [z]. Of this number was a great part of the mixt multitude which came with them out of Egypt, and of the conquered inhabitants of Canaan. And indeed the condition of thoſe who became circumciſed was ſo preferable to that of thoſe who continued in their old religion, that the number of them increaſed very much; and this is ſuppoſed to have put the ſelfiſh Jews upon the diſtinction between proſelytes of the gate, and proſelytes of righteouſneſs; the former of which, continuing uncircumciſed, and being bound to obſerve only the precepts of Noah, were kept in a ſtate not many degrees better than ſlavery. We find no leſs than an hundred and fifty three thouſand and upwards, of this kind in Solomon's time, who were all employed in the moſt ſervile and laborious works [a]. But becauſe this would have proved a moſt effectual way to have made them embrace the Jewiſh religion, in hopes of bettering their condition, the Jews tell us, that they admitted few, if any, into it, eſpecially in the happy reigns of David and Solomon, leſt they ſhould be induced to it only from worldly ends [b] (L).

Moſes

[z] Exod. xii. 48. Num. ix. 14. [a] 2 Chron. ii. 17. 18.
[b] MAIMON. Vide SELD. de Synedr. BUXT. Synagog. & alib.

as had renounced it to worſhip the only true God, but remained ſtill uncircumciſed, or bound themſelves, as the Jews pretend, only to the obſervation of the Noachid law; and laſtly, thoſe who by circumciſion were bound to obſerve the law of Moſes, and were thereby intitled to the ſame privileges with all the Iſraelites. It is true, they were not to ſuffer any of the firſt ſort to live among them, but it is plain by the ſequel, that they became extremely remiſs and negligent in this reſpect, and were often reproved for it by the prophets. The ſecond ſort were called גרי השער, Gere haſhabar, ſtrangers of the gate, from the expreſſion often uſed in the pentateuch, the ſtranger that is within thy gates. But when any of either ſort became circumciſed, they were then diſtinguiſhed by the name of גרי־הברית, Gere-haberith, ſtrangers, or proſelytes of the covenant, and גרי־צדק Gere-zedek, proſelytes of righteouſneſs.

(L) The Talmud compares thoſe proſelytes to the ruſt in iron, or ulcers in the body; and adds, that too much caution could not be taken in the admiſſion of them (37). For this reaſon they add,

(37) Vide Seld. de Synod. lib. ii. c. 2. art. 5.

that

Moſes commanded the Iſraelites to give the beaſts which died of themſelves to theſe ſtrangers [c], which is inconſiſtent with what the Jews ſay of their being bound to keep the precepts of Noah, one of which, and indeed the only one recorded by Moſes, was againſt eating fleſh with the blood thereof [d]: we therefore think it more probable, that they were only obliged to renounce their idolatry, and to acknowledge the one true God.

THE caſe was different with reſpect to the proſelytes of righteouſneſs; theſe becoming incorporated into the family of Iſrael, and bound to obſerve the Moſaic law, were to undergo a long and ſerious examination, wherein they ſet before them the difficulties of keeping Moſes's laws, the danger of breaking them, the contempt, and hatred, and ſometimes grievous perſecutions they expoſed themſelves to, by becoming the ſervants of the God of Iſrael, and the like. If they continued ſtedfaſt in their purpoſes, notwithſtanding theſe diſcouragements, they were then to be circumciſed, and as ſoon as the wound permitted it, they were to be baptized. And becauſe this laſt ceremony was looked upon as judiciary, it was to be performed before three judges at leaſt, and recorded; ſo that it was never to be repeated afterwards, even in caſes of apoſtacy; neither were their children, that were born after their father's baptiſm, to be baptized, but only circumciſed, as thoſe of the Iſraelites. If the proſelytes had been of a nation which uſed circumciſion, ſuch as the Iſhmaelites, Edomites, and others were, they contented themſelves with opening the ſear of circumciſion with a launcet, and drawing out ſome drops of blood, after which they were admitted by baptiſm; and as for their women, they were only to be baptized, without any other ceremony. Moſes made likewiſe ſome difference between nation and nation, with reſpect to their admiſſion into what he terms the congregation of the Lord [e]. The Edomites were received after the ſecond generation, becauſe they were brethren, and ſo that they were refuſed three times, but if they perſiſted in their deſire of being admitted, they were then to be circumciſed, before two or three ſufficient witneſſes, to be baptized, in order to waſh away the filth of heatheniſm, and laſtly, to offer up the uſual ſacrifices for ſin, &c after which they were received as ſervants of the God of Iſrael (38).

[c] Deut. xiv. 21. [d] Gen. ix. 4. [e] Deut. xxiii. 1, & ſeq.

(38) Vide Baſnag. R. H. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 1.

were were the Egyptians, becauſe Iſrael had been a ſtranger in Egypt. The Moabites and Ammonites, on the contrary, were not to be admitted till after the tenth generation, as ſome underſtand the text; or, according to the letter of the original, not even after the tenth generation, becauſe, inſtead of receiving the Iſraelites with a brotherly hoſpitality, they hired Balaam to curſe them (M). Baſtards, and all illegitimate iſſue, were under the ſame excluſion with them (N). The

(M) The Jews obſerve that Moſes expreſſes himſelf only in the maſculine, Ammoni and Moabi, a man Ammonite or Moabite, to intimate, that he did not mean to exclude a woman from being admitted upon ſome extraordinary account. Thus Ruth, tho' a Moabiteſs, was, for her extraordinary piety, married to Boaz, the great grandfather of David (39). But we ſhall ſee in the next note, that this is not the only inſtance of their admitting perſons expreſly excluded by that law-giver.

(N) The original word is ממזר, Mamzer, by which the Jews generally underſtand, not only all kinds of inceſtuous and adulterous iſſue, but likewiſe children begot in fornication, or even in wedlock, when either of the parents were Canaanites, or of any idolatrous nation, and unconverted (40). The Septuagint, Vulgate, and the Canoniſts take it to ſignify only the ſon of a proſtitute. The truth is, the right meaning of it cannot be fixed, becauſe it is uſed only in this place and in Zechariah (41), but in neither is explained in the context. What has induced the Jews to underſtand it of inceſtuous and other unlawful iſſue, is, that the Mamzer is mentioned juſt before, and put upon the ſame foot with the Ammonites and Moabites, who were born by inceſt (42); but if that were the caſe, how came the two ſons of Judah, Pharez and Zarah, whom he had by his daughter-in-law Tamar (43) not to be reputed ſpurious? If it be ſaid he knew her not, yet 'tis plain ſhe knew him; and the Jews, againſt whom we object this, pretend, that either in inceſt or adultery, tho' neither party be conſcious, as when a woman, believing her huſband long ſince dead, marries another, or vice verſa, yet the iſſue of ſuch a marriage is Mamzer, or ſpurious; ſo that according to this canon of theirs, thoſe two and their poſterity ought to have been excluded.

Again, as to the children of whoredom, it is plain, they have not always been rejected, ſince Jephthah, who was both judge and general in Iſrael, was the ſon of a concubine (44). We muſt therefore ſuppoſe, either that theſe were particular caſes excepted, or, which is moſt probable, that Mamzer ſignified ſomething different from either of theſe, perhaps the children begot by an He- brew

(39) Vide Munſt. in Deut. xxiii. 1, & ſeq. (40) Idem ibid. (41) Zh. ix. 6. (42) Gen. xix. 31, & ſeq. See Vol. II. p. 79. (43) Gen. xxxviii. 13, & ſeq. (44) Judg. xi. 1.

The Amalekites, as well as eunuchs of all kinds (O), were totally excluded; the former, becauſe they were under the divine Anathema [f]; and the latter, becauſe their condition was accounted a legal defect [g]. What is meant by not entering into the congregation of the Lord, is not agreed; ſome underſtanding by it, their being denied admittance into the Iſraelitiſh commonwealth by circumciſion; and others, their being only excluded from places of authority. This laſt is the moſt probable and moſt received among Chriſtian interpreters. The Jews, however, underſtand it of contracting affinities and intermarriages with the Iſraelitiſh women, for it was a received maxim among them, that the children did follow the quality of the mother. Every proſelyte of righteouſneſs was obliged to circumciſe all the males, and baptize all the females in his family under the age of thirteen; but thoſe that were above that age might chooſe whether they would ſubmit to it, or remain in their old religion. On the other hand, thoſe under thirteen could not be admitted to proſelytiſm, without the conſent either of their parents, or, in caſe of their refuſal, that of two or three judges. In this caſe their admiſſion was looked upon as a new birth, and their parents were no longer eſteemed as ſuch; inſomuch, that they believed this kind of new converts to receive a new brew upon a Canaaniti∫h or an idolatrous woman, in order to deter them from ſuch unlawful mixtures, by the conſideration, that the iſſue of them muſt be excluded from all the privileges of the Iſraelitiſh commonwealth, both civil and religious; but whatever it meant at firſt, the Jewiſh canoniſts, according to their uſual rigidneſs, have extended it not only to all illegitimate iſſue, but even to that whoſe legitimacy is any ways doubtful (45).

[f] Exod. xvii. 14, & ſeq. [g] Vide Levit. xxi. 20.

(O) The original implies a man who has any defect, either in his teſticles, or in his penis, by fracture, compreſſion, or by any other way. We ſhall obſerve here with the Jews, however, that there is no proper name either for thoſe parts in either ſex, or for ſeveral other things which modeſty forbids to utter, in all the ſacred books. This they bring as an argument of the holineſs and chaſtneſs of the Hebrew tongue; but whether it be not ſaid with more zeal than truth, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of in another place.

(45) Vide Seld. ubi ſup. & de Jur. Nat. & Gent. lib. v. c. 16. & lib. de ſucceſſ. bon. l. iii. & alib. paſſ. Munſt. ubi ſup. & al. it. præc. neg. 117.

ſoul

ſoul after baptiſm [h]. Well might therefore our Saviour wonder, that Nicodemus, who was a maſter of Iſrael, ſhould heſitate at his diſcourſe concerning a new birth [i]. We find ſeveral other regulations concerning the prerogatives of theſe proſelytes, in the Talmud and other Jewiſh writings, which we ſhall not dwell upon, becauſe they do not appear to us to be of divine appointment. Such was the law which made the children born after the baptiſm of their father to inherit, in prejudice of thoſe that were born before it; and another which aſſigned the eſtate of a proſelyte, who had no children after his baptiſm, not to thoſe he had before, nor to the king, or to the public, but to the firſt perſon that ſeized upon it. But theſe, and many more ſuch, the reader may ſee in the authors above quoted.

Laws of the ſecond table: or concerning the Jewiſh government, with the cuſtoms relating to it.

Laws of the ſecond table.

THESE we ſhall mention in the ſame order as they are in the decalogue, and begin with thoſe which relate to parents, whether in a political or natural ſenſe. The patriarchal government being become impracticable, by reaſon of its being branched out into ſo many families, whom God nevertheleſs deſigned to live as one, under one head, one religion, and one body of civil laws; and the precepts of Noah, or rather the laws of nature, being perhaps partly forgot, and partly corrupted, during their Egyptian thraldom; God was pleaſed to prevent all murmurings and oppoſition, which ſuch a change might cauſe in ſo untractable a people, by declaring, that himſelf would be their king, and appoint them his vicegerents from time to time, under whom the heads of families ſhould govern and adminiſter juſtice to thoſe under them, in exact conformity to his laws. Moſes was declared the firſt vicegerent, and accordingly it is ſaid, that he gave a law, or rather a body of laws, and an inheritance unto the congregation of Jacob, and was king in, or over Jeſhurun, that is, over Iſrael (P), when [h] Vide SELD. ubi ſup. & de J. N. & G. & JAC. ALTINH Diſput. de Proſelyt. R. MOS. KOTZ. R. Mos. Ægypt. Iſſur biath perek, SERRAR. Trihœres. lib. ii. c. 2. DRUS. de trib. ſect. FAG. in Exod. xxii. 21, & al. in Deut. xxiii. 1. vide & præc. neg 113, & ſeq. LEO DE MODEN. pt. v. ch. 3. CALM. ſub. voc. Proſelyte, & al. [i] John iii. 1, & ſeq.

(P) The word ישורון Jeſhurun is derived from ישר Jaſhar, to be righteous; which name is given them, not ſo much for when the heads of the people and the tribes of Israel were gathered together [k]; that is, as we understand the original, when the divided power of the heads of tribes and families became concentred under one head. To him succeeded Joshua and the judges, but still by God's appointment; and nothing evinces more the reasonableness, or rather necessity, of this change of government, than their constant backslidings into all manner of idolatry and wickedness at every interregnum, when their inferior rulers became so remiss, that as often as we read, that there was no judge among them, so often we find, that every one did that which was right in his own eyes, or that they did evil in the sight of the Lord [l]: but as every defection brought its punishment with it, they at length grew weary of their frequent captivities. But instead of having recourse to God by repentance, they bethought themselves of that expedient of having a king, who should be always ready at hand to defend them, and God, having condescended to their desire, appointed Saul to be their monarch; and the Jewish commonwealth took then the name of a kingdom. This may be the reason, why God, whom their ingratitude could not provoke to forsake them, though he resented this their imprudent desire of being governed by a king like other nations (Q), gave them so their righteousness, as for that of their progenitors, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; or more likely, perhaps, on account of those righteous laws which God himself had dictated unto them.

[k] Deut. xxxiii. 4, 5. [l] Vide Judg. ii. & seq.

(Q) Maimon tells us, out of the last part of the Mishnah, that Moses gave the Israelites three express commands, namely, 1, To choose them a king. 2. To destroy Amalek, and 3. to build a temple, after they were possessed of the land of Canaan. The same we find likewise enjoined in the 114, 115, and 116 affirmative precepts of their oral law, according to which that rabbi observes, that they chose Saul for their king before they declared war against the Amalekites. But if this had been the case, there could have been no room for God's relenting, and Samuel's reproving them so severely for it. Maimon doth indeed endeavour to wave this objection, by pretending, that what displeased God, was their coming, in a tumultuous and disrespectful manner, to Samuel, and asking a king, not in obedience to the divine command, but out of an itch to be like their neighbours; but this is neither agreeable to the text (46), nor to Josephus, who imputes

(46) Vide 1 Sam. viii. toss.

this

ſo few laws to inforce their obedience to him, whilſt he made ſome coercive ones to reſtrain him from oppreſſing them. The univerſal paſſiveneſs of thoſe nations whom they wanted to imitate, as well as their own whenever they were kept with a rigid hand, made the former unneceſſary; and, on the other hand, the exceſſive power, which was then lodged in the regal dignity, made it extremely dangerous, unleſs limited by wholſome reſtrictions. We need not a more lively inſtance of this early deſpotic power of kings, and of the people's baſe ſubmiſſion to it, than the horrid ſlaughter which Saul, their firſt king, made of eighty five guiltleſs prieſts, and of all the innocent inhabitants of Nob, even to their very ſucking children and all their cattle †: and if this had not been likewiſe the caſe of other nations, Samuel could not have given ſo pathetic a liſt of the hardſhips they were to expect under an abſolute monarchy. But whether this, or any other, were the reaſon, ſure it is, that we find nothing in the whole body of the Moſaic laws to enforce an obedience to princes, except the command, honour thy father and thy mother [m]; which alluded moſt likely to the patriarchal government; and an expreſs prohibition againſt curſing the rulers of the people [n]; whereas there are ſeveral very expreſs ones to reſtrain them from abuſing their power and oppreſſing their ſubjects. Of this nature are thoſe which exclude all ſtrangers from being raiſed to that dignity [o], that forbid a king of Iſrael to multiply horſes, wives (R), riches, and the like [p]; that oblige him to write a copy of God's law, to read and meditate upon, and to govern himſelf by it, without deviating from it to the right or Concerning kings.

† 1 Sam. xxii. 18, 19. [m] Exod. xx. 12, & alib. [n] Ibid. xxii. 28. [o] Deut. xvii. 14, 15. [p] Ibid. ver. 16, 17.

this deſire of a kingly government to the intolerable corruption which had crept into all the courts of juſtice, through the baſeneſs and avarice of Samuel's two ſons, whom he appointed to officiate for him in his old age (47).

(R) What the Jews underſtand by multiplying wives, is having above eighteen at a time, that is, two more than David had, who they ſay, is recorded to have had but ſixteen; and by multiplying horſes, they underſtand having more than ſerved him and his retinue (48); but we ſhall ſhew, that if there was any ſuch oral law Solomon made very light of it in either caſe, even from the firſt year of his reign.

(47) Ant. lib. v. c. 6. (48) Vide præc. pag. 222, & ſeq.

left [q]; that enjoin him to make choice of perſons of wiſdom and integrity to be judges over the people, and ſuch like [r].

HOWEVER, as they were accountable only to God for the breach of theſe laws, ſo none were reſtrained by them, but ſuch as feared him; as for the reſt, it is plain from their hiſtory, that they made no ſcruple of tranſgreſſing them in inſtances of the higheſt nature; and that their power was ſo great that none did dare to control them, or even reprove them, except ſuch prophets as were commiſſioned by God for ſo doing. Their being anointed, at leaſt in the beginning (S), by ſome celebrated prophets, and appointed [q] Ver. 18, & ſeq. vide & præc. negat. 221, & ſeq. [r] Deut. xvi. 18, & ſeq. vide & præc. affirm. 96, & ſeq.

(S) The Talmudiſts tell us, that the immediate heir of a king, who had been anointed, was himſelf proclaimed king without unction, eſpecially in the family of David; and that the ceremony was only uſed when a younger ſon was preferred to the eldeſt, as in the caſe of Solomon (49). Maimon tells us, that the confection of this oil, or royal ointment, was alſo preſcribed by God, and gives us the receipt of it; he adds, that it was hid with that of the prieſts, with the ark, &c. juſt before the captivity, and that it could never be found; but where he had all theſe particulars is hardly worth enquiring (50) The Jews obſerve further, that Saul and Jehu were anointed בפך השמן, Bepach haſhemen, with a vial of oil, to denote the ſhortneſs of their reign; but that David and his poſterity were anointed בקרן, Bekeren, with a horn of oil, to ſignify the uninterrupted ſucceſſion of it (51); but there ſeems to be more ſubtilty than truth in that remark. One thing is certain, that the cuſtom of conſecrating any thing to God by this profuſion of oil is very antient, as appears from the inſtance of Jacob's anointing the pillar of Bethel (52). How much earlier it began, and how introduced, is impoſſible to gueſs; but it is plain, that it became in uſe during the whole Moſaic diſpenſation, in the dedication both of men and things to the immediate ſervice of God. Of the firſt kind were the kings, prieſts, and prophets, and of the ſecond, all the ſacred utenſils of the tabernacle. But how far this ceremony was typical of Chriſt, who is emphatically called the Meſſiah, or anointed, or of the ſpiritual unction under the goſpel, is out of our province.

(49) 1 King. i. paſſ. (50) Maim Halak Kele Hammikdaſh. c. 1, & alib. (51) Kimch. Comm. in 1 Sam. x. 1. Vide Hotting. in Goodwin's Moſ. & Aar. lib. 1. c. 4. § 2, & 3. Baſnag. in Cun. lib. i. c. 14. (52) Gen. xxviii. 18, & ſeq.

ſovereigns

ſovereigns of a nation, which the ſcripture calls a royal prieſthood [r], gave them a full power, not only in matters purely civil and military, but in eccleſiaſtical alſo. This is indeed denied by very many divines, who think, that they never exerciſed any authority in the latter as kings of Iſrael, but as prophets and inſpired perſons, ſuch as were David and Solomon. But the contrary doth plainly appear from the reformations and regulations which Hezekiah, Jehoſhaphat, Joſiah, and others made, who were neither prophets nor inſpired perſons. We have already taken notice, that they had power to conſult the oracle of Urim, and indeed they were commanded ſo to do upon all emergencies, as well as the grand council or ſanhedrin over which they preſided, whenever they pleaſed to aſſiſt at it [s]. Thus we find, that David, after he had been anointed king, even in Saul's time, did conſult the divine oracle concerning the ſucceſs of his undertaking [*]. They had likewiſe an abſolute power of life and death; and tho' according to the law of Moſes, no man was to be capitally puniſhed before he had been convicted before proper judges, and upon the evidence of at leaſt two or three witneſſes, yet we meet with frequent inſtances of perſons being put to death by the ſole will of the prince. The ſame may be preſumed to have been with reſpect to property, by the inſtances of Mephiboſheth and his ſervant Ziba [u], and others of the like nature. From that of Naboth [†] we may likewiſe conclude, that, in ſome caſes, the eſtates of perſons condemned devolved to the king: but from the laws lately mentioned againſt oppreſſing the ſubjects, it appears, rather to have been a tyrannical uſurpation, than a command, or even permiſſion from God. What profound reſpect was paid to the regal dignity appears, both from the ſubmiſſive language with which they were addreſſed [x], and the humble manner of approaching them; inſomuch, that even queens and prophets did proſtrate themſelves with their faces to the ground before them, as Nathan and Bathſheba did to David [y], though there is no doubt, but his ſon Solomon raiſed the grandeur of the throne to a much greater height. The Jews affirm, that even the high-prieſt was obliged to ſtand before the king, whereas the latter only ſtood before the high-prieſt, when he was conſulting God by Urim [z]. They add, that he alone was allowed to ſit down in the court of the temple, even in the moſt ſacred part of it, namely, that of the prieſts, provided he was of the lineage of David; whereas their ſenators were only allowed to ſit in that which belonged to the people [a]. The magnificence of their dreſs did not a little contribute to raiſe an awe in their ſubjects. It is true, that there is nothing preſcribed concerning it, either in the Moſaic law, or any other inſpired writer, and that we have no clear deſcription of it in the ſacred books; but it is plain from Jehoſhaphat's going to fight againſt the Syrians in his royal robes, whilſt Ahab changed his own for a common dreſs [b], that there was a manifeſt difference between them, if not in ſhape, at leaſt in beauty and coſtlineſs, ſuch as jewels about their crown (T), the purple mantle, and the like. Joſephus tells us [c], that Solomon did uſually go clad in white, but this was a colour common both to the prieſts and nobles (V); ſo that the difference

[r] Exod. xix. 6, & alib. [s] MAIM. Halak Melakim, c. 2. [*] 1 Sam. xxx. 7, & 8. Vide BARNAG. ubi ſup. [u] 2 Sam. xix. 29. [†] 1 King. xxi. paſſ. [x] Vide int. al. 1 Sam. xxv. 23, & ſeq. & ver. 40. 2 Sam. xiv. 33. xxiv. 20, & alib. [y] 1 King. i. 16, 23. [z] MAIM. ubi ſup.

ed

[a] Id. Halak. Beth. Habkir. [b] 1 King. xxii. 30. [c] Ant. lib. viii. c. 2.

(T) It is plain, that this ornament was ſo far from being peculiar to crowned heads, that the prieſts and perſons of high rank were allowed to wear them. Nay it ſeems from Ezekiel's being forbid by God to take his own off his head, in token of mourning (53), that every private man did wear ſomething of the ſame nature. This ornament, which the Hebrew calls פְּאֵר, Peer, is ſuppoſed to have been a kind of ribbon or fillet, which went round the head, and was worn, not only by the Jews, but by other eaſtern nations; from which thoſe of princes, though called by other names, are thought to have differed only in the richneſs of the materials, and of the precious ſtones that adorned them (54). Hence David calls his own עֲטֶרֶת פַּז, Hattereth-paz, a crown of the pureſt gold (55). We read indeed of one which that monarch took from the king of the Ammonites, which is ſaid to have weighed a talent of gold (56). But we ſhall ſhew in its proper place, that it means not that it weighed, but that it was worth ſo much, by reaſon of the precious ſtones that were about it.

(V) Hence came perſons of high birth and rank to be called חוֹרִים, Chorim, albati, præclari, in oppoſition to thoſe of obſcure birth, who were called חַשּׁוּכִים, Chaſhukim, tenebroſi, obſcuri. To this diſtinction the apoſtle St James ſeems to alude (57), when he ſays: if a man come into your aſſemblies——in goodly ap-

(53) Conf. Ezek. xxiv. 17. & 23. (54) Vide Calm. Comm. in Exod. xxiv. 17. & auct. ab eo citat. (55) Pſal. xxi. 3. (56) 2 Sam. xii. 30. 1 Chron. xx. 2. (57) James ii. 2.

par-

ference muſt be in the richneſs, whether of the linen or ſilk of which they were made. However, as they were not tied by the law to any dreſs, we need not to doubt, but they followed the faſhions of other countries, and were more ſumptuouſly clad upon ſome particular occaſions than ordinary [d]. The pſalmiſt has likewiſe given us a beautiful deſcription of the dreſs of queens [e], which was ſtill richer than that of kings; but we ſhall dwell no longer upon it.

Laws and Cuſtoms relating to Judges and Courts of Judicature.

Courts of judicature.

WE need not ſpeak here of thoſe judges, emphatically ſo called, who governed Iſrael from Joſhua to Saul, theſe being appointed from time to time by God himſelf, we find, were entirely governed by his laws, and in doubtful caſes by his ſpirit, with which they were endued; they had the ſupreme authority during their life, and differed in nothing from kings, but in title, pomp, and grandeur, and their dignity not being hereditary; in all other caſes their power was the ſame. They could make peace and war, ſummon the tribes to arms, conſult God by Urim, and the like. They are ſaid to have judged Iſrael, and that the people repaired to them for judgment, and that they took yearly circuits through the land to adminiſter juſtice [f]; but whether this was done by way of appeal from the judgment parel, or, as the original has it, ἐν ἐθῆτι λαμπρᾷ, in a white or ſplendid robe——and a poor man, ἐν ἐθῆτι ῥυπαρᾷ, in a dark or dirty one. We read indeed in the book of Eſther of the royal ſceptre, crown, and princely apparel (58). But beſides that theſe are of a later date, we do not know how far theſe ornaments were imitated by the Jewiſh kings. However, it is plain, that even in Ahaſuerus's court, neither the golden crown, nor the purple, or any other colour, were peculiar to the kings, ſince we find Mordecai adorned with them, as a reward of his merit 59); and we have elſewhere ſhewn, that the crown was the diſtinguiſhing ornament of perſons of the higheſt rank, in the courts of all the eaſtern princes *.

[d] Vide 1 Sam. xxviii. 8. 1 King. xxii. 10, 30. JOSEPH. Ant. lib. vi. c. 10. & alib. RASC. & al. [e] Pſ. xlv. [f] Vide Judg. iv. 5. 1 Sam. iii. 20. iv. 1. vii. 15, & ſeq. & alib.

(58) Eſth. iv. 11. vi. 8. (59) Ibid. c. viii. 15. * See Vol. II. p. 448.

of

of inferior courts, as the dernier reſort, or by way of conſulting them in doubtful caſes, is not eaſy to determine (W).

BUT beſides theſe, Moſes, and after him thoſe who were at the head of the Iſraelitiſh commonwealth, were commanded to appoint a number of judges and magiſtrates in all cities, to adminiſter juſtice to the people in every tribe. Theſe were to be men of wiſdom and probity, well verſed in the law of Moſes, free from covetouſneſs and partiality; ſuch as would protect the innocent, the fatherleſs and widow, the helpleſs and ſtranger, and puniſh the guilty and wrong-doer [g] (X). We find likewiſe ſeveral denunciations againſt thoſe who [g] Exod. xxiii. 8, & ſeq. Deut. xvi. 18, & ſeq. xvii. 2, & ſeq. xix. paſſ. xxiv. 17, & ſeq. xxv. 1. & ſeq. & alib. paſſ. Ezek. xliv. 24. præc. affirm 97. 10.

(W) The latter however ſeems moſt probable, from the command of Moſes, that in all doubtful caſes, whether criminal or civil, wherein the inferior judges could not eaſily determine, they ſhould apply themſelves to the prieſts and to the judge or head of the people then in being, to whoſe judgment they ſhould ſubmit under pain of death (60). The Jews indeed pretend, that this application was to be made to the great council, or ſanhedrin ‡, which they pretend to have ſubſiſted ever ſince the time of Moſes. But we have elſewhere ſhewn, that the council which Moſes appointed, laſted only during the lives of the elders, and that this ſanhedrin was a new inſtitution of a much later date †. So that, in all doubtful and diſputed caſes, no perſons could be more proper to be applied to, than theſe judges, who were endued both with the ſpirit of God, and with the ſupreme authority, ſince even this latter was thought ſufficient afterwards in the time of their kings, as appears from very many inſtances, eſpecially thoſe quoted in the margin (61).

(X) To theſe excellent requiſites in the Iſraelitiſh judges, the Talmud has added a great number of others, ſome of which are impracticable, and others quite ridiculous. Such are thoſe which oblige them to be maſters of ſeventy two languages, that they may have no occaſion for an interpreter, in caſes wherein ſtrangers are concerned; that they be well verſed in the magic art, not in order to practiſe it themſelves, but to be able to judge rightly in all caſes of that nature. In this they ſeem even more cautious than Joſephus, who, though otherwiſe far from imitating them in their rabbinical fooleries, ſeems nevertheleſs to have a particular fondneſs for that pretended ſcience, making Solomon to have been the

(60) Deut. xvii. 8, & ſeq. ‡ Præc. affirm. 3. † See before p. 3. note (H). (61) 2 Sam. xiv. paſſ. 1 King. iii. 16. & ſeq. 2 King. viii. 3, & alib. paſſ.

greateſt

who ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be bribed to act contrary to the ſtrict laws of juſtice; but as they were appointed by the kings, ſo their virtue did riſe and fall according to the goodneſs or wickedneſs of theſe. We may ſay more: Samuel was himſelf a moſt upright judge, and yet his two ſons, who acted under him, proved moſt unrighteous; David was likewiſe a pious monarch, and yet had there not crept a great deal of corruption into the courts of judicature, his ſon Abſalom could have had no pretence for wiſhing, that he had been a judge, that he might do juſtice to every one that applied to him for it [h].

THESE courts were held at the gates of the cities, as we have elſewhere ſhewn †; and became in time very conſiderable, but how they were kept, or how many judges belonged to each; whether their power was equal, or ſome ſubordinate to others, the ſcripture gives us no light into. We read indeed, that Moſes, during their abode in the wilderneſs, appointed rulers over thouſands, over hundreds, fifties, and tens [i], and theſe were in all likelihood ſubordinate to one another, but how far this model was followed, when they came into the land of Canaan, doth not appear. However, we may ſuppoſe, that theſe courts conſiſted at firſt but of very few perſons, and that every thing was tranſacted in them with the utmoſt plaineſs and ſimplicity; neither were there then many kinds of offices or dignities, ſince we read but of four ſorts of officers, even in Joſhua's time; namely, the elders, the heads, the judges, and the officers [k]. It is impoſſible to determine what their offices were, only the laſt

[h] 2 Sam. xv. 2. & ſeq.
[i] Exod. xviii. 24, & ſeq.
† See Vol. II. p 378. note (F).
[k] Joſh. xxiv. 1.

greateſt maſter of it, and to have left behind ſeveral noble ſecrets, by which ſome of his own countrymen made themſelves famous even in his days (62). The Talmudiſts moreover exclude from the courts of judicature all childiſh and ſuperannuated perſons, ſtrangers, and eunuchs. The former indeed is agreeable to reaſon, and the two latter are expreſly excluded by Moſes (63); but we dare not warrant the reaſon which they give againſt the laſt of them, viz. that their being eunuchs inclines them to cruelty. In other caſes their directions for the choice of theſe magiſtrates, as well as for their behaviour in that office, are very reaſonable and judicious (64).

(62) Ant. lib. viii. c. 2. (63) Deut xvii. 15. & xxiii 1.
(64) Vide præc. neg. 194, & ſeq. & affir. 95, & ſeq.

are ſuppoſed to have been a kind of beadles or executioners. In the flouriſhing reigns of David and Solomon, they increaſed very much [1], and in proceſs of time became ſo corrupted, that the prophets were obliged from time to time to exclaim againſt them. One of them having been ſent to Jehoſhaphat, to denounce God's heavy judgments againſt Iſrael for thoſe abuſes, wrought ſo upon that good king, that he immediately ſet about making a thorough reformation, appointing new judges in every walled city, ſome of whom were of the tribe of Levi, and charging them, in the moſt preſſing terms, to be more watchful and upright than their predeceſſors. He likewiſe appointed two tribunals for the city of Jeruſalem, the one conſiſting chiefly of prieſts and Levites, for matters of religion; and the other, which was moſtly made up of the heads of families, for matters of ſtate. In this condition they are ſuppoſed to have continued till the captivity, bating that as the princes became more and more wicked, ſo did the judges under them, till God was provoked to drive them out of the land. This is all we can ſay upon that article, with any tolerable certainty. As for what Joſephus and the Talmudiſts do add concerning magiſtrates and their courts, as their accounts differ from one another, and as we are not ſure, but even the former doth rather deſcribe them as they were after, than before the captivity, we ſhall chooſe to ſubjoin it in the margin (Y). Thus

[1] Vide 1 Chron. xxiii. & ſeq. paſſ.

(Y) Beſides the grand council of ſeventy mentioned above, to which they pretend all other tribunals throughout the land were ſubordinate; the Talmudiſts tell us, there were two other courts, the one conſiſting of three, and the other of three and twenty judges; and theſe, they ſay, were to be in every city and town that had 120 inhabitants, according to ſome; or families, according to others. The firſt of theſe courts was only choſen, pro re natâ, one by each party, and the third by the other two. Their cogniſance extended no farther than to ſmall matters, ſuch as ſervants wages, petty larcenies, reſtitution, and the like. Neither could they inflict a heavier puniſhment than whipping. That of twenty three was allowed to judge of all capital caſes, and to condemn criminals to death. And if there aroſe any difference in their judgment, it was carried by the majority, for which reaſon they ſay their number was to be odd. But in caſes of moment, and of a dubious nature, the high-prieſt was to be conſulted. If a man was condemned to death, he was to be immediately led to execution: A cryer was to go before him, and proclaim the crime he was to die

Thus much we know concerning thoſe tribunals; that they took cogniſance of all civil and criminal caſes, even where the

die for; to the end, that if any perſon knew any thing that could clear him of it, he might be brought back to the judges, and have a ſecond, and, if occaſion offered, a third hearing. The ſame indulgence was to be allowed him, if he complained of being unjuſtly condemned, whilſt he went to the place of execution; in which caſe he was to chooſe two wiſe men to plead for him, and, if poſſible, to obtain a reverſion of the ſentence; but if in neither caſe he could prove himſelf innocent, he was then to be forthwith executed by the witneſſes; for, it is here to be obſerved, that if the crime was ſuch as deſerved hanging, the criminal was firſt to be ſtoned to death, and then hanged. But before execution, he was to be exhorted to confeſs his crime, and to pray, that his death might attone both for it and for all his other ſins; which if he did, they gave him then a doſe of wine mixed with myrrh or frankincenſe to ſtupify him, after which he was put to death. If he was to be hanged after it, as in caſes of idolatry, blaſphemy, and ſuch like, they ſtayed till about an hour before ſun-ſet, and then tied his hands behind him, and hoiſted him up till juſt before ſun-ſet, at which time he was taken down, and both the halter and the gallows, or tree, were buried with him (65). They except, however, out of the cogniſance of theſe courts of twenty three, all caſes whether criminal or civil, which related to the high-prieſt, to a whole tribe, and to falſe prophets, which they pretend were only to be tryed by the grand council (66). To this a learned author thinks that expoſtulation of Chriſt to allude (67), O Jeruſalem! — thou that killeſt the prophets (68). We own indeed this to have been the caſe of the ſanhedrin, in our Saviour's time, and even ſome time before, but not before the captivity; but how, or by what court, or judges, theſe extraordinary caſes were to be tryed, is impoſſible to ſay, unleſs we ſuppoſe, that it was done by a general aſſembly of the whole nation, or at leaſt of the heads of them, as we find it in ſeveral inſtances (69).

There are ſeveral other things mentioned in the Talmud, concerning all theſe courts, and the choice of their judges, which we ſhall not dwell upon, ſeeing neither the ſcripture nor Joſephus ſpeak of them; the reader may ſee them quoted in the margin (70). As the offence was of a religious nature; ſuch as idolatry, blaſphemy, witchcraft, ſacrilege, and the like; for which reaſon the for Joſephus, his account is different from them, and all that he ſays on this matter is, that Moſes ordered ſeven judges to be choſen in every city, men of known probity and learning, to which they ſhould add two prieſts or Levites, ſo that he reckons but nine judges in every court, viz. ſeven laymen and two Levites(71); and his teſtimony is moſt generally followed, becauſe he lived when the Jewiſh commonwealth was ſtill flouriſhing, whereas the Talmudiſts did not live till after the deſtruction of it.

(65) Vide præc. aff. 97, 98, & ſeq. ad. 111. (66) Vide Miſhnah, Tract. סנהדרין. c. 1. (67) Cun. Rep. Hebr. lib i. c. 12. (68) Luk. xiii. 34. (69) Vide Joſh xxii. 11 & ſeq Judg xx. 1, & ſeq. xxi paſſ. (70) Vide Mijhn. ubi ſup. Maim. in loc. & alib. Moſ. Kotz, Selden, de Synedr. Goodwin's Moſ. & Aar. lib. v. cap. 3, & ſeq. Lamy, Calm. Diſſert. ſur la police des Hebreux, & al.

We ſhall however conclude this note with an account of the form of the court of the twenty three judges, according to the Jewiſh doctors, becauſe it had a near reſemblance, not only to that of the ſanhedrin, but alſo to thoſe of other polite nations. They ſat in the form of a half moon. In the centre of it was the preſident, whom they call נשיא, Naſi, or prince, having the אב בית דין, Abb beth din, or father of the ſenate at his right-hand; the reſt ſat on each ſide, according to their ſeniority or merit. At each end was a clerk or ſecretary, who took the depoſitions in writing. Some add a third, whoſe office was to gather the votes of the court. At the feet of the judges ſat their diſciples, in three rows or forms, whoſe buſineſs was to obſerve every thing that was ſaid or done; and theſe were choſen to ſucceed thoſe on the bench, either at their death, or when they became unqualified by old age or any other impediment. The accuſed perſon was placed upon an eminent place in the court, that he might be eaſily ſeen by all, and the witneſſes ſtood fronting him. Theſe were to be diligently examined, and their character enquired into, and if any flaw was found in it, they were ſet aſide; but if any was found to have given falſe evidence, the Talion law was his portion (72); that is, he was condemned to the ſame puniſhment as his evidence would have brought upon the innocent. The סוטרים, Soterim, that is, the officers or executioners, were alſo to attend the court conſtantly, with rods and leathern ſcourges in their hands, to execute the ſentence of the judges. The accuſed perſon was likewiſe allowed a counſellor to plead for him, who was called בעל ריב, Baal-rib, the maſter of the proceſs; and he ſtood on his right hand and pleaded for him. Many expreſſions there are in the Pſalms, in the prophets, and other places of the old teſtament, that ſeem ſo plainly to allude to one or other of theſe judicial forms, as make it more than probable, that they were in uſe long before the captivity. After a full hearing the votes were gathered and examined, and according to them, the perſon was either abſolved or condemned in words to this purpoſe. Thou Simeon art innocent: thou Judah art guilty: and if the latter, (71) Ant. lib. iv. c. ult. (72) Deut. xix. 18, 19.

and

the prieſts and Levites were appointed to aſſiſt, if not to preſide, in them. The next in authority to the magiſtrates were natural parents, and theſe were to be honoured and obeyed in a moſt particular manner [m] (Z). St. Paul obſerves, that this is the firſt command with a promiſe [n]; and the puniſhment of diſobedient and wicked children was no leſs ſevere. It was death for any to curſe or ſtrike their parents [o], or even to continue in a ſtubborn diſobedience to their commands. In this laſt caſe they had power to inflict any puniſhment but death upon them: and if that proved ineffectual, they might then bring and accuſe them before the judges, who upon full and his crime was capital, he was immediately put into the executioners hands, and led to execution: but if the crime was ſuch as only deſerved whipping, it was forthwith performed before the whole court (73)

[m] Exod. xx. 12. Deut. v. 16, & alib. [n] Eph. vi. 2. [o] Exod. xxi. 15, 17. Levit. xx. 9.

(Z) The Talmudiſts obſerve, that the law lays a greater ſtreſs upon honouring our parents, than upon honouring God, becauſe we are only enjoined to honour the latter with our ſubſtance (74); whereas we are bound to honour the former, whether we have any ſubſtance or not, and to work in order to be able to maintain them (75). This is a duty to which the Egyptians ſeem to have been ſtrangers, if what Herodotus ſays of them be true, that the ſons were not bound to maintain their parents, unleſs they were willing, but that the daughters were obliged to it, whether willing or not (76) It likewiſe excelled that of the Perſians, Greeks, Romans, and other polite people, in that it included both parents, whereas theſe only, or at moſt principally the father. This appears by the Perſian law mentioned by Ariſtotle, by the Roman digeſts, and inſtitutions mentioned by Epictetus, Simplicius, Philo de legatione, and others (77). We ſhall obſerve further, that the words of the promiſe annexed to this command run thus in the original: that they may prolong thy days, and ſo on; from which the generality of Jewiſh interpreters conclude the word they to relate to the father and mother ſo honoured, namely, that they might prolong by their prayers and bleſſings the life of their dutiful children. The words are indeed capable of either ſenſe, but if the Jews had taken them in this laſt in our Saviour's time, they wou'd not have met with ſo ſevere a reproof from him for eluding that precept.

(73) Vide de his Miſhn. Tract. Sanhedr. c. 5. Maim M Kotz, & al. ſup. citat. vide & præc. affirm. ſup. citat. (74) Prov. iii. 9. (75) Rabb. Simeon. Vide præc. affirm. 112, & 113 (76) Herodot. lib. ii. c. 35. Vide Cuiac. Harmen. ad N. and P. laws, c. 6. (77) Idem ibid.

proof were obliged to condemn them to death [p], without mercy or delay. And now we are upon the ſubject of puniſhments, it will not be improper to conclude this article with an account of thoſe which were either appointed by the Moſaic law, or made uſe of at the prince's will, againſt obnoxious perſons, before the captivity.

Puniſhments. OF the firſt kind were the ſmaller ſort of puniſhments, which were either 1. Fines by way of compenſation for wrongs, theft, and the like: and in this reſpect the Jews were ſo ſtrict, that if a man had built a houſe, in which there was but one ſingle piece of timber or a ſtone that was ſtolen, they made no difficulty of pulling down the houſe, if they could not get it out without it, to reſtore it to the owner. 2. Selling for ſlaves thoſe who were not able to pay their debts, or make ſatisfaction for a wrong. 3. The Talion law, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, ſtripe for ſtripe, and ſo on. Laſtly, whipping; and this laſt was not to exceed forty laſhes [q] (A). The capital puniſhments were of four kinds; namely, ſtoning, burning, beheading, and ſtrangling [r]. 1. Stoning was the moſt uſual, and when the law condemned a perſon to death, without naming the kind, this was always underſtood to be meant by it *. Some modern Jews rather think, that it was ſtrangling, becauſe it was an eaſier death, and that in caſes where the particular kind is not expreſſed, the moſt favourable is to be choſen [s]; but it is more probable from the caſe of adultery, that ſtoning was the puniſhment underſtood; for it is ſaid in Ezekiel [t], I will judge thee with the judgment of wedlock-breakers, &c. and two verſes after, they ſhall ſtone thee with ſtones- - - - - - and it is plain, that the Jews underſtood it in that ſenſe in our Saviour's time, by what they ſaid to him, when they brought the adultreſs before him [u]. The crimes which deſerved this death were all kind of inceſt, ſo-

[p] Deut xxi. 18, & ſeq. [q] Ibid. xxv. 3. [r] Exod. xxi. paſs. Levit. xxiv. 14. & Num. xv. 35. 1 King. xxi. 13. See before p 71. note (F). * Vide Deut. xvii. 7. [s] Vide R. SALOM. in Exod. xxi. 16. [t] Ch. xvi. 38. [u] John viii. 5.

(A) In this laſt caſe the Talmudiſts ſay, the criminal was to be ſtripped down as low as his breaſt, or heart, though they were forced to tear his clothes for it. The executioner was to have a laſh made of calves leather, of a convenient breadth, and long enough to go round his middle; and in caſes where the utmoſt ſeverity was to be uſed towards the criminal, he was to give him 39 ſtrokes with all the ſtrength he had (78).

(78) Vide prec. aſſirm. 105.

domy,

domy, beſtiality, raviſhing a betrothed virgin, or her conſenting to be defiled by another man ; blaſpheming, ſabbath-breaking, witchcraft, idolatry, enticing others to idolatry, rebellious children, offering one's ſeed to Moloch, and ſome others of the like nature. For ſome of theſe laſt, the criminal was likewiſe to be hanged, after he had been ſtoned to death, as we have ſeen in a former note, where we have alſo hinted ſomething concerning the manner of this execution, and to which we have nothing to add, but that it was always done out of the city, as it was out of the camp during their abode in the wilderneſs. Here, after he had confeſſed his fault, the witneſſes came and laid their hands upon his head, and ſaid aloud, Thy blood be upon thee, and threw the firſt ſtones, and the reſt of the ſpectators helped to diſpatch him * (B). This, however, muſt be underſtood of regular caſes, for there were others of an irregular nature, wherein it was allowed to ſtone the criminal, ſuch as a blaſphemer, idolater, adulterer, upon the ſpot, without further tryal. But theſe ought rather to be looked upon as zealous mobbings, though encouraged under the ſpecious title of judgment of zeal, founded upon the action of Phinehas, mentioned in another part of this hiſtory †.

2. BURNING. This puniſhment was uſed before Moſes, as appears by Judah's condemning his daughter-in-law to the flames w. Some interpreters indeed think, that he meant no more than to have her burnt in the forehead, or ſtigmatized for her incontinency ; but without any probability. We

* Deut. xvii. 7. † See before p. 26. w Gen. xxxviii. 24.

(B) The Talmudiſts mention another kind of ſtoning, by precipitating a man from ſome conſiderable eminence, at leaſt of the height of two men. One of the witneſſes tied his hands behind him, and the other threw him down ; and if he did not die by the fall, they threw ſtones upon him till he was dead. The Moſaic law doth not indeed mention this kind of puniſhment, but we find it practiſed in our Saviour's time (78). They add, that when the criminal was within ten cubits of the place of execution, in either way of ſtoning, they exhorted him to confeſs his crime ; when within four cubits, they ſtripped him R. Jehuda ſays, that a man's middle was to be covered before, and a woman's behind ; others that the men only were to be ſtripped, and the women to die in their clothes (79).

(78) Luk. iv. 29. Cocceio Interpret.

(79) Miſhn. ubi ſup. c. 6. § 1, & ſeq.

Shall

shall not here repeat what we said on that subject ‡. The Mosaic law condemned the daughters of priests to be burnt for incontinency [x]; and Achan was condemned to be stoned and burnt for sacrilege [y]. These are the only two places where that punishment is mentioned. The Jews tell us also of some other crimes which were punished with it, particularly some kinds of incest [z]. They add, that it was twofold; namely, burning with fire, and with melted lead poured down the criminal's throat (C).

3. BEHEADING. This, the Jewish doctors say, was a punishment appointed only for murderers, and for towns that were fallen into idolatry. But we find indeed nothing like it to have been practised before the captivity, in a judicial way. It is true indeed, that Abimelech, one of Gideon's sons, caused seventy of his brethren to be beheaded upon one stone at Ophrah [a]; that the men of Samaria sent the heads of the same number of Ahab's sons to the new king of Israel [b]; and that forty two of Ahaziah's brethren were put to death, probably in the same way, by the same Jehu's orders [c]; but it is plain, that none of these were done in a judicial way. We find likewise instances of persons being put to death by the sword. Thus Samuel killed the king of Amalek [d]; in the same manner David ordered the messenger of Saul's death to ‡ See Vol. II. p. 418. note (R). [x] Levit. xxi. 9. [y] Josh. vii. 25. See before p. 71. note (F). [z] Vide Mos. KOTZ in tract. Sanhedr. c. 1. GOODWIN's Mos. & Aar. lib. v. c. 7. § 13. [a] Judg. ix. 5. [b] 2 King. x. 7. [c] Ibid. ver. 13, & seq. [d] 1 Sam. xv. 33.

(C) The first they call burning of the body, and the other, burning of the soul. This last was the most frequent among them, and some of the rabbies acknowledge no other way but this to have been used, though the places mentioned above imply rather the former. The Talmudists do indeed condemn it, and think it unlawful to burn the bodies of their brethren to ashes. They infer it from what is said of the sons of Aaron, who, though killed by a supernatural fire, yet remained unconsumed, since the text says (80). that they were carried dead out of the camp, in their coats, but rabbi Eleazar is said in the Talmud to have disallowed the conclusion, affirming, that he had seen a priest's daughter burnt to ashes; to which he is only answered, that her judges were ignorant Cutheans; that is, a mungrel kind of Samaritans, who knew nothing of the law (81).

(80) Levit. x. 5. (81) Mishn. Tract. Sanhedr. ubi sup..

be ſlain [e]: and Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei were killed by Solomon's order, one of them at the very foot of the altar [f].

STRANGLING. The text makes no explicit mention of this kind of death; but the Talmudiſts reckon ſix ſorts of criminals that were condemned to it; namely, 1. Thoſe that ſtruck their parents. 2. Men-ſtealers. 3. The prieſts that refuſed to conform to the determination of the court. 4. Falſe prophets, or thoſe who propheſied in the name of falſe Gods. 5. He that defiled another man's bed, And 6. He that had criminal converſation with a prieſt's daughter. Theſe were executed as follows: they were immerged in dung up to the knees: two executioners tied a napkin about their neck, and twiſted it till they were quite ſuffocated. All kinds of criminals were buried apart by themſelves, and on the ſame day, together with the inſtruments of their death, whatever they were, to blot out as much as poſſible the remembrance of it [g] (D).

BUT the moſt dreadful of all their puniſhments, tho' not a capital one, was excommunication; eſpecially that which they Excommunication.

[e] 2 Sam. i. 15. [f] 1 King. ii. 25, 34, & 46. [g] Tract. Sanhedr. ubi ſup.

(D) To theſe we may add ſome foreign puniſhments, which were afterwards adopted by their kings; ſuch were thoſe which David cauſed to be inflicted on the Ammonites (82), and that to which Manaſſeh put the prophet Iſaiah, whom he is ſuppoſed, by ſeveral antient fathers (83), to have cauſed to be ſawn in two from the head downward, with a wooden ſaw, from the words of the apoſtle (84), ſome were ſawn aſunder. The difficulty here is about the wooden ſaw, how it could be fit for ſuch a purpoſe. But allowing the thing to be really fact, and a tradition of it to have been preſerved, we need but ſuppoſe the expreſſion to be an Hebraiſm, that is, a wooden ſaw, for a ſaw with which wood uſed to be ſawn, which is a common idiom in that tongue. This expreſſion of cutting in two, and cutting aſunder is indeed frequent in the old teſtament, and in the apocryphal book of Suſanna. We omit ſome other puniſhments of the like nature, which would only fill our readers with horror. As for that of crucifixion, ſuch as Chriſt ſuffered, tho' ſome have fancied it to be implied in the words of Deuteronomy (85), if a man be hanged on a tree, his body ſhall not remain all night on it, &c. yet it is generally allowed to have been, not a Jewiſh, but a Roman puniſhment, and ſo foreign to our purpoſe.

(82) 2 Sam. xii. ult. (83) Juſtin Mart. Dialog. cont. Tryph. Orig. ex lib. apocr. Hieron. in Iſai. & al. (84) Hebr. xi. 37. (85) Deut. xxi. 22.

called Shematta (E), answering to the Syrian Maran-atha used by St. Paul [h], which signifies in both tongues, the Lord comes or is at hand. Enoch, the seventh from Adam, is sup[h] 1 Cor. xvi. 22.

(E) The Jews reckon three kinds, or rather degrees of excommunication. The first they call נדוי, Niddui, from נדה, Nadah, to separate, or put from one. So that this word was indifferently used, to express those that were separated for any uncleanness, or for any crime that came within this degree of excommunication (86). The time of its lasting was limited to 30 days, and yet the delinquent could either shorten it by doing penance, or lengthen it by stubbornness, even to the end of his life, if he persisted in it. In this last case, they refused to circumcise his children, and if he died impenitent, the judge ordered a stone to be thrown into his coffin or bier, to shew, that he deserved to have been stoned.

The second degree they called חרם, Cherem, anathema, and this they pretend was more severe than the Niddui, because it excluded the person from the synagogue, and from all civil commerce, which the other did not. But we have shewn elsewhere, that this word signified quite another thing, and was applicable to men and things vowed to death or destruction (87); and our learned Selden has proved, that there were really but two kinds of excommunication, the lesser and the greater, and that the terms, Niddui, Cherem, and Shematta, were used indifferently (88).

The last however, according to them, was this, שמתא, Shematta, which they pretend was proclaimed by the sound of 400 trumpets, as, they say, it was done at the cursing of Meroz by Deborah. A person so excommunicated was never to be received again into the congregation, and some pretend, that it was even lawful to put him to death. For this reason they derive the word from שם, Sham, there, and מיתה, Mattah, death. To which the expression of St. John is supposed to allude; there is a sin unto death; that is, according to them, a sin that deserves to be devoted to death (89). But all this is forced, and that which derives it from שם, Shem, the name, (which word they commonly use instead of any of the names of God, as we have seen elsewhere) and אתה, comes, or is at hand; seems to us the most rational, and answers to the Syriac Maran-atha, which bears the same sense. As for the crimes to which these excommunications were annexed, and the manner of pronouncing them, or of absolving those that had incurred them, we can affirm nothing certain; and so shall go no farther with this point. The reader may consult Selden and Buxtorf in the places above quoted, or the learned J. Jam. Hottinger (90), and others.

(86) Vide int. al. Ezek. xviii. 6. (87) Vide Levit. xxvii. 29. Josh vii. 11, & seq. See before p. 226. note (O). (88) De Synedr. vet. Hebr. lib. i. c. 7, & 8. (89) 1 John v. 16. Vide Bertram, de Polit. Jud. cap. 2. (90) De Bigm. Diff. illust. Theol. de penitent. p. 49, & seq.

posed

poſed the author of it, becauſe St. Jude quotes that ſaying of his, behold the Lord cometh with ten thouſands of his Saints to execute judgment; and ſo on [i], which muſt have been at leaſt owing to ſome tradition among the Jews. However, theſe fetch the original of it, both from thoſe frequent expreſſions in the Moſaic writings, that ſoul ſhall be cut off from Iſrael, and thou ſhalt put away evil from the midſt of thee; and more particularly from the words in Deborah's ſong, Curſe ye Meroz, ſaid the angel of the Lord, curſe ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof [k]. But without enquiring into the validity of theſe ſubtile etymologies, we find a more expreſs form of it in Ezra and Nehemiah [l], who excommunicated all thoſe that refuſed to repudiate their ſtrange wives; and exacted an oath from the people, to avoid all affinity and commerce with them. The ſame account of it we find in Joſephus, who adds, that the goods of the excommunicated perſon, were to be confiſcated to the holy treaſury [m]. It is true, this was done after the captivity; but we need not doubt, but they had precedents and laws for it before that time; for it is ſaid, that it was performed in a legal way, and purſuant to the laws of God. As for the form and method of pronouncing it, and in what caſes it was to be done, we cannot be certain. Buxtorf hath indeed given us a full account of it from the Talmudiſts [n], but, beſides that we dare not vouch for its antiquity, the form of it is ſo full of the moſt dreadful imprecations, that they cannot be read without horror. Some of them ſeem to have been taken from the 109th pſalm, and improved with all the dire curſes both of this world and the next. As excommunication paſſed from the Jews to the Chriſtians, St. Paul makes uſe of ſome other of their expreſſions, beſides that of Maran-atha; particularly that of delivering up to ſatan [o]; but it is plain, by what he ſubjoins immediately after, for the mortifying of the fleſh, that the ſpirit may be ſaved in the day of the Lord, that it was not uſed by the primitive church in that damning ſenſe, in which the Jews, and ſome modern churches, underſtand it.

Laws againſt Murder.

Murder.

MOSES tells us, that, from the time of the flood, murder could not be expiated but by the death of the murderer [p], whatever might be the puniſhment of it before that time. Under the law God ſeems to expreſs a much greater abhorrence againſt it; he not only forbad it in the decalogue [q], but appointed avengers to puniſh the guilty perſon wherever they found him [r], and permitted him to be torn from the moſt ſacred places of ſanctuaryſhip to condign puniſhment [s], as was lately hinted; and expreſly forbid both the avenger and the judges to make any compoſition, or to accept of any other recompence for the crime [t]. Theſe laws extended equally to Iſraelites and to the ſtrangers that dwelt amongſt them [u]. The only caſes therefore in which one man might lawfully kill another were, 1. When the avenger of blood found a manſlayer out of his place of refuge. 2. In a man's own defence. 3. In defence of a brother Iſraelite. And laſtly, an infant might likewiſe be deſtroyed to preſerve the life of the mother, but not vice verſâ (F). To theſe the Jews add that which they call the right of zeal, hinted under the laſt head, by which it was lawful for any number of men to fall upon a perſon, who was caught in any abominable fact, ſuch as blaſpheming, offering his ſeed to Moloch, and the like, and to kill him upon the ſpot. Thus the Levites went out and killed three thouſand of the worſhippers of the golden calf; and Phinehas puniſhed an abominable whoredom with death. We may alſo add another inſtitution, extremely proper to inſpire the people with an uncommon horror againſt wilful murder; namely, that for the expiation of an uncertain murder. It was as follows. As ſoon as the judges, who lived near the place where a man was found murdered, were informed of it, they were to examine what town was neareſt to it, and to ſummon the elders of that city, who were thereupon obliged to bring a heifer that had never been yoked, and to drive her into a rough uncultivated valley and there ſtrike her head off. Theſe and the prieſts were then

[i] Ver. 14. [k] Judg. v. 23. [l] Ezr. x. 7. & ſeq. Nehem. xiii. 25. [m] Ant. lib. xi. c. 5. [n] Buxt. Lex. Talmud. p. 828. [o] 1 Cor. v. 5. [p] Gen. ix. 6. See Vol. I. p. 252.

Uncertain murder.

[q] Exod. xx. 13. xxi, 12. Deut. v 17. Levit. xxiv. 17. & alib. [r] Num. xxxv. 19. [s] Exod. xxi. 14. [t] Numb. xxxv. 31, 32. [u] Levit. xxiv. 22.

(F) The Jews add, that he that ſeeth his brother in danger of hislife, as for inſtance, of drowning, of being killed by another, or by a wild beaſt, or of being unjuſtly put to death, when he could ſave his life, is guilty of wilful murder. This they infer from that prohibition of Moſes, thou ſhalt not ſtand againſt the blood of thy neighbour (91). The man likewiſe that ſwears falſly againſt another, in order to have him adjudged to death, was alſo to be deemed and puniſhed as a murderer (92).

(91) Levit. xix, 16. Vide Munſt. in loc. & præc. neg. 164 & 165.
(92) Vide Deut xix. 19.

to

to waſh their hands over her, and to profeſs, that their hands had not ſhed this blood, neither their eyes ſeen it done; after which they were to pray to God not to lay it to their charge [w]. One may ſee by all this ſolemn ceremony, and by all the above-mentioned laws, what care was taken to deter them from the guilt of ſhedding innocent blood. It was for this very reaſon alſo, that God gave them ſeveral laws, whoſe only tendency was to divert them from cruelty; ſuch were thoſe that forbad them to ſeeth a lamb or kid in its mother's milk; to kill the dam and her young, both in one day; to catch the old birds and their brood together; to muzzle the ox that treadeth the corn; to refuſe to aſſiſt a neighbour's, or even an enemy's beaſt, that ſunk under its burden; and many more of the like nature, all highly proper to inſpire them with ſentiments of humanity and good nature, which the ſlaughter they were going to make of ſo many nations, juſtly doomed to it for their wickedneſs, might otherwiſe have been apt to extinguiſh in them.

Laws againſt adultery, and all other unlawful commerce of ſexes. The trial of adultery, or water of jealouſy; concerning marriage and levirate.

Laws againſt adultery.

IT will ſcarcely be thought needful to enquire how far the words, thou ſhalt not commit adultery [x], excluded all other carnal gratifications, which were not confined within the bounds of lawful wedlock (G). It is ſufficient to ſay, [w] Deut. xxi. 1, & ſeq. [x] Exod. xx. 14. Deut. v. 18.

(G) This is indeed the received opinion of many Jews and Chriſtians, who by the word נאף, Naph, underſtood all kind of illicit coition and unnatural luſts (93). Yet we beg leave to take notice, that ſome of the antients on both ſides underſtood it of the breach of conjugal faith. Accordingly we find by Philo and Tertullian, that ſome of the Greek copies placed this law againſt adultery, before that againſt murder in the decalogue; and theſe two great orators have taken the pains to prove the former to be the more grievous crime of the two, and to deſcribe the great hurt it doth to human ſociety; the latter concluding it to be the greater crime, becauſe forbidden before murder (94). However, it is certain that Moſes has no where given ſuch a weighty reaſon againſt that, as he doth againſt this, when he ſays, for in the image of God made he man (95).

(93) Vide Abenezr. in Exod. xx. & Comment. ſer. om. in loc. (94) Tertul. de Pudicit. Vide. Carlton, Concord. c. 7. (95) Gen. ix 6.

that

that inceſt, rape, ſodomy, and beſtiality, are forbid by other expreſs laws, and made capital as well as adultery [y]. As for fornication, though it was not made capital in ſome caſes, yet was it forbid by ſeveral laws [z]. The difference was, that any woman who ventured to marry under the notion of being a virgin, and was proved to be otherwiſe, was to be ſtoned [a]; whereas, if a man deflowered a virgin, he was to pay her father fifty ſhekels of ſilver, and to marry her, without having it in his power to put her away, during her life [b]. Adultery was puniſhable with death in both parties, whether they were both married, or only the woman, but we cannot affirm the puniſhment of a married man to have been the ſame who committed adultery with an unmarried woman; for beſides that the crime was not alike, with reſpect to ſociety, it is plain, that Moſes, was forced to indulge them in ſome other particulars, as unjuſtifiable as this, ſuch as polygamy, divorce, and the like, which are juſtly condemned in the goſpel.

HOWEVER, with reſpect to their wives, as there was a neceſſity, that they ſhould be kept under ſtricter ties, to prevent ſtrange mixtures in families, ſo in order to deter them from all unlawful liberties of that kind, as well as perhaps to prevent thoſe that were innocent, from being unjuſtly ſuſpected, and ill treated by their jealous huſbands; Moſes was commanded to appoint the water of jealouſy, with the promiſe of a conſtant miracle, by which the guilty ſhould be puniſhed in a very dreadful manner, and the innocent would be cleared with applauſe. The ceremony was to be performed in the following manner [c].

Water of jealouſy.

2. WHENEVER a man had conceived a miſtruſt of his wife's incontinency, he was to bring an offering for her, peculiar to this caſe; namely, a cake made of barley-meal, without oil or incenſe, and to put it into the hands of the prieſt. At the ſame time he brought his wife alſo, and declared what grounds he had for ſuſpecting her. The prieſt then took the accuſed woman before the Lord, either to the tabernacle or temple, uncovered her head (H), and put the offering into her hand, whilſt himſelf took ſome holy water, made

[y] Vide Levit. xviii. paſſ. ibid. xx. 10, & ſeq. Deut. xxii. 25.
[z] Ibid. xxiii. 17, 18. Levit. xxi. 7. [a] Deut. xxii. 20, 21.
[b] Ibid. ver. 28, 29. [c] Num. v. 24, & ſeq.

(H) The Jews underſtand by it ſhaving her hair, or at leaſt cutting the curls off. They add, that they tore her cloaths down to her breaſt, and tied them with a pack-thread, others ſay, that her made bitter with ſome ſuch herb as wormwood, into which he put ſome of the duſt of the floor or pavement, together with the words of the curſe written at full length, to this effect: that if ſhe had been guilty of defiling her marriage-bed, thoſe waters ſhould ſwell and burſt her belly, and rot her thigh; but if ſhe was innocent, they ſhould have no power to hurt her. Theſe words he firſt read to her aloud, and if ſhe perſiſted to go on with the trial (I), ſhe anſwered, Amen, Amen. He was then to blot out the words of the curſe in the bitter water, they being according to the Jews, written with an ink made without vitriol, which would be eaſily waſhed away; after which he gave her the water to drink, whilſt he took the offering or cake of jealouſly off her hand, and waved it to the Lord, and burned part of it upon the altar. The conſequence was that if ſhe was guilty, the water did burſt her belly, and rot her thigh, and ſhe died ſoon after her drinking of it; but if ſhe was innocent, ſhe not only came off unhurt, but as a token and reward of her continence, ſhe became more healthy and fruitful, and the husband was to take her her cloaths were exchanged for a black ſuit, in token of mourning, and in this manner ſhe was expoſed to public view. Theſe circumſtances, they tell us, had ſomething ſo dreadful to the Jewiſh women, eſpecially the chaſte ones, that they ſtudied nothing more, than to keep themſelves free from any ſuſpicion, which might expoſe them to that, which they eſteemed worſe than death. For this reaſon they did not ſuffer a woman to be brought to this trial upon every ſlight ſuſpicion. The husband was to bring ſome proofs, that he had forewarned her, more than once or twice, againſt being ſeen in ſuch a man's company, as he was jealous of, notwithſtanding which they had been found together in private, or in ſome remote place at leaſt, as long a time as a man might boil an egg and eat it †.

(I) Here they tell us likewiſe, that a great deal of pains was taken to perſuade her to confeſs her fault, if ſhe was guilty, rather than to expoſe herſelf to the dreadful effects of the miraculous water; and that they would even force her to walk ſo long and ſo faſt, till ſhe was quite tired, in order to extort a confeſſion from her, either through wearineſs, or ſhame of being thus expoſed to public view. If ſhe confeſſed the fact, ſhe was not obliged to drink the water, but was immediately divorced from her husband, loſt her dowry, and went and lived ſingle; but if ſhe ſtill inſiſted upon her being innocent, the prieſt was then to conduct her to the eaſt porch of the temple, where he told her aloud, that if ſhe was really ſo, ſhe had nothing to fear; but if guilty, ſhe muſt expect the puniſhment threatened by Moſes to fall immediately upon her.

† Vide Munſt. in Num. v.

home

home and cheriſh her the more, for having given him ſuch an eminent proof of her chaſtity. This is all that we find in the Moſaic law. The Talmudiſts have added ſeveral other circumſtances relating to this ceremony, which we ſhould be loath to warrant, both becauſe, by their own confeſſion, it had been diſuſed ſeveral centuries, before their time, ſince which adultery became more frequent; and becauſe neither the canonical nor apocryphal books, or indeed any of their writings that we know of, afford us one ſingle inſtance of its ever having been uſed before that time, whereby one might gueſs where they had them; for which reaſon we chooſe to give them in the margin (K). For ought appears therefore, this ceremony might be inſtituted only in terrorem, and yet prove very effectual, both to keep the wives within the bounds of conjugal fidelity, and the huſbands from too lightly ſuſpecting them of a breach of it; eſpecially if another circumſtance, which the Jews tell us, be true, or was believed to be ſo, that theſe waters could have no effect upon the wife, how guilty ſoever, if the huſband had likewiſe been guilty of tranſgreſſing the laws of wedlock [d]. Whether the Iſraelites had ſeen any the like cuſtom in Egypt, or in any other nation, which made it expedient to have ſomething among them in [d] SELD. de Synedr. & Uxor. Hebr. BUXTORF. MUNST. in Num. v. BASNAG. Rep. Hebr. lib. i. c. 12. CALM. ſub voc. Adult. & al. mult. poſt rabbin.

(K) Accordingly they affirm, that if ſhe was guilty, ſhe had no ſooner drank the water, than ſhe began to look pale and ghaſtly, her eyes ſwelled out of her head, and ſhe loſt the uſe of them: her belly likewiſe ſwelled ſo viſibly, that they made all the haſte imaginable to convey her away, leſt ſhe ſhould defile the place by her death. They add, what is ſtill more remarkable, that the man who had had criminal commerce with her, died at that very inſtant, and much in the ſame manner, how diſtant ſoever from her, and ignorant of what was done. The time of this miraculous ceremony being ſet aſide is not agreed; ſome affirming, that it was diſuſed after the captivity, and others, that it continued till about an hundred years before the deſtruction of the ſecond temple. All own however, that the reaſon of its being ſet aſide was, that adulteries became, not only more frequent, which conſequently would have kept the prieſts and judges continually employed, but were likewiſe more public, ſo that the trial of clandeſtine or doubtful ones became uſeleſs, when men committed them ſo publicly, that all the world was apprized of them (96).

(96) Vide Seld. Buxt. Munſt. Lamy, Cun. Baſnag. & al. ſup. citat.

imitation of it, we will not affirm; but it is plain, that almoſt every country ſince had a kind of trial or ordeal, not only for caſes of incontinency but almoſt for every crime.

3. MARRIAGE. We find but few laws concerning this inſtitution, beſides thoſe which we have mentioned under the laſt article againſt adultery (L). Moſes contented himſelf with reſtraining the Iſraelites from marrying within certain degrees of conſanguinity, which had till then been permitted, to prevent their taking wives from among the idolatrous nations with whom they lived. This was the reaſon which Abraham gave for chooſing a wife for Iſaac from his own kindred [e], and his deſcendants for following his example [f]; but which was now entirely ceaſed, by their being ſo exceedingly multiplied. Theſe are therefore the degrees which that lawgiver forbad as inceſtuous, under pain of death. 1. To marry ones own father or mother. 2. Father or mother-in-law. 3. The brother or ſiſter of ones father or mother. 4. A grand-ſon or grand-daughter. 5. An uncle or aunt. 6. A ſon or daughter-in-law. 7. Two brothers or ſiſters, by which the Jews underſtood thoſe only by the mother's ſide, becauſe they looked upon this conſanguinity to be greater than the paternal ones, perhaps from a belief that the mother contributed moſt to the generation of the child †. 8. A brother or ſiſter-in-law. 9. The huſband or wife of an uncle or aunt. 10. The father and ſon, or mother and daughter, either together, or one after the death of the other [g]. As for the other laws relating to matrimony, they ſeem rather to be taken from the practice Marriage.

[e] Gen. xxiv. 3, & ſeq. [f] Ibid. xxvi. 34, 35. xxviii. 1. & alib. † Vide PHILO de Spec. Leg. CLEM. ALEX. Strom. ii.
[g] Levit. xviii. 6, & ſeq.

(L) Tho' the Moſaic law doth no where oblige men to marry, yet the Jews have always looked upon it as an indiſpenſible duty implied in the words, increaſe and multiply (97); ſo that a man, who did not marry before he was twenty years of age, was counted acceſſary to any irregularity which the young women might be tempted to, for want of being timely married. They had a proverb in the Talmud, who is he that proſtitutes his daughter, but he who keeps her too long unmarried, or gives her to an old man? For this reaſon they uſed to marry them as ſoon as they came of age, which with them was at twelve; but if their fathers married them before, they might, when they came to it, be parted from their huſband, if they did not like him.

(97) Gen. i. 28. ix. 1.

of the patriarchs. Thus he forbids the firſt-born to be diſinherited, out of favour or affection to another wife, as when a man has two wives, and loves one more than the other. In ſuch a caſe it was not lawful for him to transfer the inheritance to the children of the favourite wife, if that of the other was the firſt-born [h]. This is in imitation of Abraham, who gave portions to all his other children, and the inheritance to Iſaac [i]. The only difference here is, that Moſes orders but a double portion to the eldeſt [k]. Herein is alſo a ſecond law, tacitly implied at leaſt, for a man to have two wives: to which he adds a third, namely, that upon the marriage of a ſecond wife, a man ſhall ſtill be bound to continue to the former her food, her raiment, and the duty of marriage [l]. This laſt is alſo conformable to what Laban exacted of Jacob, when he married the ſecond ſiſter after the firſt [m]. Theſe laws are an imitation of the practice of ſeveral of the old patriarchs (M).

Levirate. THE ſame thing may be ſaid of that law which is called the Levirate, which obliged a man, whoſe brother died without iſſue, to marry his widow, and to raiſe up ſeed to his bro-

[h] Deut. xxi. 15, & ſeq. [i] Gen. xxv. 5, 6. [k] Deut. xxi. 17. [l] Exod. xxi. 10. [m] Gen. xxix. 27.

(M) The Jews did not content themſelves with this ſmall allowance of two wives, as we may infer from the examples of David and Solomon, and many others. But it muſt be obſerved, that they made a diſtinction between the wives of the firſt rank, and thoſe of the ſecond, the firſt they called נשים, Naſhim, and the others פילגשים, Pilagſhim, which laſt, tho' moſt verſions render by the word Concubines, Harlots, and Proſtitutes, yet in none of thoſe places of ſcripture where that word occurs (which are about 36 is any ſuch ſiniſter ſenſe implied. However, there is a two-fold difference between theſe and wives of the firſt rank †; firſt, with reſpect to the manner of taking them, namely, the latter with the uſual ceremonies, and the former without; and ſecondly, with reſpect to their authority, and the honour paid to them and their children. One thing Maimon (98) tells us from the Talmud, that a man might have as many wives as he could maintain, even to an hundred, and that it was not in their power to hinder him, provided he had riches and ſtrength ſufficient for them all; the rule with reſpect to this laſt was, that he ſhould pay them the conjugal debt at leaſt once a week, and not run in arrear above a month with any one. But as to the concubines, they could claim no more than what the man was pleaſed to allow them.

† Conf. 1 King. xi. 3. & 2 Chron. xi. 21. (98) Halak. Iſhoth. c. 14.

ther;

ther [n]; for this is no more than what we find had been the practice in Judah's time [o]. However, Moſes doth here leave it in ſome meaſure to a man's choice, whether he will comply with the law or not; and in caſe of a refuſal, the widow could only ſummon him before the judges of the place, where, if he perſiſted, ſhe untied his ſhoe, and ſpit in his face, and ſaid, thus ſhall it be done unto the man that refuſes to build up his brother's houſe, or family; after which he was branded with the appellative of the man whoſe ſhoe was unlooſed (N). To this number we may alſo add another law, which obliged the huſband to pay down a competent dowry for the wife, or as the Jews termed it in their contracts, to pay the price or equivalent of her virginity [p]. Thus Abraham ſent his ſteward with a conſiderable quantity of riches to preſent his future daughter-in-law and her relations [q]: Jacob purchaſed his two wives at the price of fourteen years ſervitude [r]; and when Hamor came to ask his daughter for his ſon Shechem, he bid him raiſe the price of her dowry as high as he pleaſed [s]. David likewiſe modeſtly confeſſing his inability to pay a dowry anſwerable to Saul's daughter, the king acquitted him for an hundred prepuces of the Philiſtines, and the prophet Hoſea

[n] Deut. xxv. 5, & ſeq. [o] Vide Gen. xxxviii. 6, & ſeq. [p] Vide MAIM. in Iſhoth. c. 3. § 1. [q] Gen xxiv. paſſ. [r] Ibid. xxix. 18, & ſeq. [s] Ibid. xxxiv. 12, & ſeq

(N) From the words here uſed by Moſes, if brethren dwell together (99), one would be apt to conclude, that this law was only intended for ſuch as dwelt ſtill in their father's houſe, which ſeems to have been the caſe of Judah's three ſons, mentioned above. Accordingly the rabbies have underſtood this law in a very reſtrained ſenſe, both in this and ſome other particulars; ſuch as that the eldeſt only of the ſurvivors was obliged to marry the widow, and not even he, if he was already married, in which caſe, they pretend, that it was left to his option. But if we look into the antient practices, in the times of the judges, we ſhall find, that Boaz, who was neither brother, nor neareſt of kin to the deceaſed, did yet think himſelf obliged to marry Ruth, upon the neareſt kinſman's refuſing to do it (100); from which one would be apt to conclude, that the law rather extended farther, and that where no brothers were left to marry the widow, that duty became incumbent on the neareſt relation in courſe. However, it is plain from the caſe which the Sadducees put to our Saviour, about the ſeven brethren that had had the ſame woman ſucceſſively (1), that this law was not underſtood in that limited ſenſe in which the Talmudiſts have ſince taken it.

(99) Deut. xxv. 5. (100) Ruth iv. paſſ. (1) Matt xxii. 24, & ſeq.

bought a wife for fifteen pieces of silver and a small quantity of barley ; so that a man might be truly said to have purchased as well as to marry a wife. However, if we may believe the rabbies, they tell us, that the father generally accompanied the husband's presents with some of his own; such as cloaths, and some money, not exceeding the sum of fifty suzims, or about five and twenty shillings.

FROM these and such like instances we may likewise conclude, what was their way of courtship, or rather of contracting and celebrating their marriages; the former was transacted by the parents or relations on both sides, and when the matter was agreed, the bridegroom was introduced to his bride: presents were exchanged on all sides, the contract signed before witnesses, and after consummation, the bride tarried still some time with her relations, how long or how short, we cannot exactly say (O); after which she was sent away to her husband's habitation, with singing and dances at the sound of several instruments. This last was generally performed in the night, and the parable of the ten virgins plainly alludes to it [t]. It was likewise customary with them to contract these marriages whilst their children were very young, and this was called espousing; after which, both parties continued with their parents, till they were of age to consummate it. As for the daughters, whether they were espoused or not, they were kept very strict and out of sight by the Israelites, tho' this custom seems rather to have been taken up after the misfortune of Jacob's daughter, than borrowed from their neighbours, who made no scruple to send theirs to feed and water their flocks; as we find it was done by La-

 1 Sam. xviii. 25. Hose. iii. 2. [t] Matt. xxv. 1. & seq.

(O) This interval is however supposed to have been a week, from the words of Laban to Jacob, fulfil her (Leah's) week, and thou shalt have Rachel also (2); but this is at best but a conjecture. The same may be said of what some Jews tell us of the space allowed between the betrothing and consummation, which they will have to be about a year. This they gather from what Rebekah's relations said to Abraham's servant, let her tarry at least ten days, by which they understand so many months (3), but neither the original, nor Septuagint, admit of that exposition; and it is more likely that it was left to the discretion of the parents.

(2) Gen. xxix. 27. (3) Vide Onkel. & R. Salom. Vide Munst. in Gen. xxiv. 55. Goodwin's Mos. & Aar. lib. vi. c. 4. § 8.

ban's

ban's ſiſter and daughters as well as by thoſe of Jethro among the Midianites [u]. From this privacy with which the unmarried damſels were kept, they came to be called Almahs, which ſignifies hidden or concealed (P). We have elſewhere taken notice of a law which forbad heireſſes to marry out of their own tribe [w], from which the reſt were exempted: but a man was left to his liberty, to marry not only in any of the [u] Vide Gen. xxiv. 13. & ſeq. xxix. 9. Exod. ii. 16. [w] Num. xxxvi. paſſ. See before. p. 29.

(P) From the word עלם, Alam, or rather Ghalam, to hide. To this ſeems to allude that ſaying of Agur (4), if rightly tranſlated ——— the way of the man, בעלמה, Behalmah: that is, (not with, as our verſion hath it, but) in the maid or virgin. And here we beg leave to obſerve, that an anonymous Engliſh author took upon him, under the name of the famous Monſ. Le Clerc, to quarrel with this text, as trifling and obſcene (5); whereas our verſion being the only one we know of that renders it with a maid, the objection could flow but from an Engliſh pen, and, we may venture to add, one that had but a ſuperficial knowledge of the original, which is not only capabie of, but doth manifeſtly carry a much ſublimer ſenſe; we hope therefore the reader will not think it amiſs if we take this opportunity of doing juſtice to the text, and its divine author, by ſetting it in its full light.

Whoever examines the preface in the four or five firſt verſes of this chapter, will eaſily own, that ſuch lofty expreſſions could only be deſigned to uſher in ſome ſublime myſtery; but who can find any ſuch in theſe words, whether we read them in or with the maid? that is, whether we underſtand them of coition or generation? Beſides, where is there, either the analogy or climax implied in the beginning of the verſe, there are three things too hard for me, yea four, or rather, a fourth, which I cannot comprehend; what analogy doth the way of a man, whether in or with a maid, bear to that of an eagle in the air, or a ſhip in the midſt of the ſea, &c. or wherein is the former harder to be underſtood than the latter? But if we underſtand it of the conception of a man in a virgin, as the words ſeem plainly to imply, then both the analogy and climax will be very natural; and the conception of the man, or as the word גבר Gebber, imports, the mighty man in a virgin, continuing ſtill ſuch, will appear moſt fitly compared to the flight of an eagle in the air, &c. which leaves no trace behind, and at the ſame time be moſt juſtly eſteemed the hardeſt of all the reſt to be accounted for. This text may therefore juſtly be looked upon as parallel to that of Jeremiah xxxi. 22.—— The Lord has, or will, create a new thing, a woman ſhall incompaſs Gebher, a man, or the mighty man.

(4) Prov. xxx. 19. (5) Letters concerning inſpiration.

twelve

twelve tribes, but even out of them, provided it was with ſuch nations as uſed circumciſion [x], ſuch as were the Midianites, Iſhmaelites, Edomites, Moabites, and Egyptians (Q). This law ſeems alſo founded upon what the ſubtile ſons of Jacob ſaid to the Shechemites, it is not lawful for us to contract affinity with one that is uncircumciſed [y]. However, this muſt be underſtood of ſuch only as were admitted into the Jewiſh religion; as for thoſe that were not ſo, they were not ſo much as permitted to have any carnal commerce with them, except in the caſe of an Hebrew ſoldier's having taken a Gentile captive, to whom Moſes indulged the liberty of lying once with her, before the marriage was confirmed: this at leaſt ſeems to be the ſenſe of the words [z]; becauſe if he did not like her, he might put her away; only he was to give her liberty as a recompence for her virginity. A maid-ſervant, tho' converted to Judaiſm, was not capable of matrimonial right, whilſt her ſervitude continued; but if her redemption was paid, or ſhe was manumitted, ſhe might become a wife [a]. If a woman was not wholly free, her marriage ſeems to have been neither in force, nor abſolutely void, becauſe in caſes of unchaſtity, ſhe was not to be put to death, as the free women were, but came off with a whipping [b].

These are the main laws relating to marriage. As for the manner of its celebration, Moſes has left no direction about it. Some few ceremonials may be gathered from ſcripture, and the reſt from the rabbies. We do not find, that it was accompanied with any religious ceremony, ſuch as going to the tabernacle or temple, offering of ſacrifices, or even that it was performed by or before a prieſt; only from the [x] Compar. Deut vii. 3. & xxiii. 7. 8. [y] Gen. xxxiv. 14. [z] Deut. xxi. 10, & ſeq. [a] Seld. Jus Nat. & Gent. lib. v. c. 17. Vide Jos. lib. 4. c. 8. Carlton's Concord. pt. i. c. 7. [b] Levit. xix. 20.

(Q) Accordingly we find, that Moſes married a Midianite, Boaz a Moabite (6); Maachah, Abſalom's mother, was the daughter of Talmai, king of Geſhur (7); Amaſa was the ſon of Jether, an Iſhmaelite, by Abigail, David's ſiſter (8); and Solomon, in the beginning of his reign, married Pharaoh's daughter (9). Whenever therefore we find him and other kings blamed for marrying ſtrange women, we muſt underſtand it of thoſe nations that were idolatrous and uncircumciſed.

(6) Ruth. iv. (7) 1 Chron. iii. 2. (8) 1 Chron. ii. 17, & ſeq. (9) 1 King. iii. 1.

examples

examples of Iſaac with Rebekah, of Boaz with Ruth, and of Tobias with Sarah, we may conclude, that the parents and the reſt of the company did pray for the proſperity of the new-married couple. Theſe nuptials were accompanied with feaſting and mirth, which laſted a whole week: thus Samſon's wedding is ſaid to have laſted ſeven days [c]; and Tobias was deſired by his father-in-law that his might laſt twice that ſpace [d], probably becauſe they were not likely to ſee one another after that time. What ſplendor did uſually accompany theſe feaſts, where their circumſtances would admit of it, we may conclude from that beautiful compariſon of the pſalmiſt, of the glory of a riſing ſun to a bridegroom coming out of his nuptial chamber [e]. He likewiſe deſcribes in another pſalm the richneſs of the bride's attire, the pomp of her attendance, and the grandeur of the ſolemnity in moſt elegant terms [f]. The paranymph, or friend of the bridegroom (R), and the bride-maids are likewiſe mentioned here and in the Canticles. Beſides theſe the bridegroom and bride had a number of companions, that aſſiſted during the whole feaſt. Samſon is ſaid to have had thirty at his wedding [g]: however, we muſt not ſuppoſe both ſexes to have aſſiſted promiſcuouſly, the cuſtom of the eaſtern countries did not allow of it; and it is much more likely, that they had ſeparate tables, apartments,

[c] Judg. xiv. 17. [d] Tobit. viii. 19. 20. [e] Pſ. xix. 5.
[f] Pſ. xlv. paſſ. vide & Iſai lxi. 10. [g] Judg. xiv. 11.

(R) His office was to invite, and compliment the gueſts in the name of the new-married, to preſide over the ſolemnity, to ſee that nothing was wanting in the feaſt, to prevent confuſion, and ſuch like; for which reaſon he was called the בעל משתה, Baal miſhtah, ruler or maſter of the feaſt; and is perhaps the ſame with the ἀρχιτρίκλινος, in the goſpel, John ii. 9. But the Jews have added another part to his office, which was to watch over the wedding linen, that there might be no fraud or injuſtice in the tokens of virginity, ſpoken of by Moſes (10); that is, to prevent the huſband's ſuppreſſing them, in order to calumniate his wife, and the bride's ſubſtituting falſe, inſtead of true ones (11); but Moſes ſeems rather in this place to aſſign that office to the parents, eſpecially thoſe of the damſel, whom it concerned moſt, that ſhe ſhould not be falſly accuſed, ſince it not only brought a ſcandal on her family; but, as we obſerved before, ſhe herſelf was to be put to death, if thoſe tokens could not be produced.

(10) Deut xxii. 13, & ſeq. (11) Vide Gemar. Hieroſol. Tract. Ketuboth. c. 2.

and

and diverſions. Theſe laſt were ſinging, dancing, playing upon muſical inſtruments among the women; and ſome kind of manly exerciſes among the men. To theſe we may add the cuſtom of propounding riddles, and aſſigning ſome ſort of reward to thoſe that expounded them, as we find it was done at Samſon's nuptials [h]; and which the Talmudiſts tell us, was uſually practiſed upon ſuch and the like feſtivals [i]. They add, that both the bride and bridegroom uſed to wear a crown during the whole ſolemnity, until the deſtruction of the laſt temple; but that from that time that ornament was ſet aſide in memory of that cataſtrophe [k]. We read indeed of a nuptial crown made for Solomon, and preſented to him by his mother [l]; but nothing of any ſuch ornament for the bride. As for the other particular ceremonies relating to marriages, as we have no other authority for them, but that of the Talmudiſts, we ſhall chooſe to give them in the margin (S).

THEIR

[h] Ibid ver. 12. [i] Pirke. Aboth. [k] Ibid. Vide SELD. Ux. Hebr. lib. ii. c. 15. BUXTORF. Synag. & al. [l] Cant. 3. ver. ult.

(S) They had three ways of betrothing a woman. 1. By a written contract. 2. By a verbal one, accompanied with a piece of money And, 3. By carnal commerce. The written contract was conceived in words to this effect: Such a day, month, and year, A. the ſon of B. has ſaid to D. the daughter of E. be thou my ſpouſe, according to the law of Moſes, and of the Iſraelites, and I will give thee, as a dowry for thy virginity, the ſum of 200 ſuzims, as it is ordered by our law. And the ſaid D. hath promiſed to become his ſpouſe upon the conditions aforeſaid, which the ſaid A. doth promiſe to perform on the day of marriage. And to this the ſaid A. doth hereby bind himſelf, and all that he hath, to the very cloak upon his ſhoulders, engages himſelf to love, honour, feed, cloath, and protect her, and to perform all that is generally implied in contracts of marriage, in favour of Iſraelitiſh wives. Witneſſes ——— (12).

The verbal contract was made in the preſence of ſufficient witneſſes, the man ſaying to the woman, take this money as a pledge that I will take thee to be my wife.

The laſt, by carnal commerce, which the Talmudiſts pretend to have been allowed by the Moſaic law, from Deut. xxiv. 1. they ſay, was afterwards forbid, as liable to many abuſes; ſo that the other two were the only ones which gave the parties the liberty of ſeeing one another, which was not permitted to them before. When (12) Vide Seld. Ux. Hebr Bertr. ex Talm. Babyl. Buxt. Grammat. Chald. p. 383. Goodw. & al.

THEIR plurality of wives was far from being either a charge or incumbrance on them, conſidering their ſimple way of the time agreed upon for the celebrating of the wedding was come, (the day of the week being generally Friday for a maid, and Thurſday for a widow) the contract of marriage was read and ſigned before at leaſt ten witneſſes, which muſt be free and of age; and the bride, who had taken care to bathe herſelf the night before, appeared in all her ſplendor, (but vailed in imitation of Rebekah, who threw a vail over her face as ſoon as ſhe came in ſight of Iſaac). She, being attended by her bride-maids, was given away by the parents, in words to this effect, take her according to the law of Moſes, and received by her ſpouſe with much the ſame words. Some bleſſings were then pronounced to the new coup'e, both by the parents and the company, and the virgins ſung a kind of epithalamium to them. After the moſt ſumptuous repaſt that their circumſtances could afford, the company began a dance, the men round the bridegroom, and the women round the bride. This dance is pretended to have been of divine inſtitution, and an eſſential part of the nuptial ceremony.

But the main ceremony, which according to the rabbies, did conſummate the marriage, and made the bride a perfect woman, was her being introduced into the nuptial chamber. Without this, all the others left it ſtill imperfect, but this compleated it; tho' ſome Levitical impediment (13) ſhould chance to hinder the conſummation of it according to our ſenſe of the word. But before ſhe was introduced thither, there were certain prayers and bleſſings to be ſaid or ſung by ſome proper perſons in favour of the married couple. They were generally couched in very pious terms, ſuch as theſe: bleſſed art thou, O Lord of heaven and earth, who haſt created man in thine own likeneſs, and haſt appointed the woman to be his partner and companion: bleſſed art thou——who filleſt Sion with joy, for the multitude of her children. Bleſſed art thou——who makeſt the barren womb to bear——who ſendeſt gladneſs to the bridegroom and his bride——who haſt ordained for them love, joy, tenderneſs, peace, and mutual affection——be pleaſed to bleſs, not only this couple, but Judah and Jeruſalem with ſongs of joy and praiſe, for the joy that thou giveſt them by the multitude of their ſons and daughters, &c. They add, that the nuptial feaſt for a widow was to laſt but three days, and ſeven for a virgin; and that this laſt was ſo obligatory, that if a man married ſeveral wives in one day, or in the ſame week, he was to allow a feaſt of ſeven days to every one of them (14). We purpoſedly omit many other ceremonies and injunctions of their wiſe men, which are ſuperſtitious and ridiculous; ſuch as the ſituation of the nuptial bed; the choice of the proper hour for conſummation; for coition at all other times, in order to beget a ſon or a (13) Vid. Levit. xx. 18.

(14) De his vide auct. ſup. citat.

of living. The domeſtic affairs were their province, whilſt that of the huſband was the buſineſs of the fields and vineyards. Dreſſing of victuals, the care of the children, ſpinning, carding, weaving, and the like are often mentioned in the ſacred books, as the womens occupation [m]; whilſt their huſbands choſe the more laborious works. However, at the worſt, Moſes had indulged them with a remedy, namely, that of,

Divorce. 4. DIVORCE. This was permitted to the Jews for the hardneſs of their heart, as our Saviour juſtly obſerves [n]; neither do we find, that it had ever been practiſed by any of the patriarchs (T), whatever it might have been by other nations. The words of the law, or rather permiſſion, run daughter, and many others of the like nature (15), which they either learned from other nations, or forged out of their own aſtrological brains. As to that law of Moſes, which interdicts the matrimonial commerce at certain periods, under ſuch ſevere penalties, (16) and which has been ſo ſcrupulouſly obſerved by them to this day, it is certain, that decency and cleanneſs were not the only reaſons for it, ſeeing the heat of thoſe climates would have made the breach of it very dangerous in ſeveral other reſpects, which are obvious to almoſt every reader.

[m] Vide int. al. 1 Sam. ii. 19. 2 Sam. viii. 13. Prov. xxxi. 13. & ſeq. & alib. paſſ. [n] Matt. xix. 8.

(T) The Jews pretend that Abraham divorced Hagar, and Moſes either Zipporah, or Tarbis, the princeſs of Æthiopia, and that this was the reaſon of the quarrel which he had with Aaron and Miriam (17), and from thence conclude, that divorce was not only of earlier date, but that it was lawful upon many other accounts beſides that of adultery. But as to Hagar, whom they pretend to have been divorced for her inſolence, it is plain, firſt, that ſhe was no wife, but a bond-woman ſubſtitute to Sarah; and ſecondly, that her expulſion was not properly a divorce, becauſe ſhe was received again after the firſt fault, and that at the ſecond, it was her ſon's behaviour, and not her own, that ſent her away (18). And as to the caſe of Zipporah and Tarbis, they are mere fictions, as we have ſhewn before †; ſo that we do not find one precedent of divorce before the law of Moſes; but afterwards they became ſo frequent, that the prophets often upbraided the Jews with it (19); and Solomon doth as much condemn the divorce of a virtuous woman as he doth the keeping of an adulterous one (20).

(15) Vide Munſt in Gen. ii. (16) Levit. ubi ſup. (17) Targ. Onkel. & Hieroſ. & Rabbin. mult. in Num. xii. 1, & ſeq. (18) Conf. Gen. xvi. 1, & ſeq. & xxi. 9, & ſeq. † See Vol. II. p. 477 note (O). & p. 498, note (Y) (19) Mic. ii. 9. Malach. ii. 14 & ſeq. (20) Vide Miſhn. c. 9. § 10. Seld Ux. Hebr. lib. iii. c. 18. & 20.

thus

thus o: "When a man hath taken a wife, and married "her, and it come to paſs, that ſhe find no favour in his "eyes, becauſe he hath found in her ſome uncleanneſs (V); "then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it "into her hand, and ſend her out of his houſe. And when "ſhe is departed ------ſhe may go and be another man's "wife; and if her ſecond huſband hate her, and write her "a bill of divorcement ----or if he chance to die ---- her "former huſband ſhall not take her again to be his wife, "after ſhe is defiled; for that is an abomination to the "Lord. -----" The queſtion is here, what is meant by the words, if he find any uncleanneſs, turpitude, or nakedneſs in her? We have ſeen in the laſt note, how the Jews are divided in their opinion about it; the Chriſtians are no leſs ſo; ſome confining it to adultery, and others to all enormous crimes, ſuch as idolatry, apoſtacy, and the like, which the ſcriptures often call fornication, and is the word made uſe of by our Saviour for adultery. For our part, we cannot believe any of theſe caſes to be meant by the words of Moſes, becauſe as theſe were all capital crimes, it would have been ridiculous to have ordained a divorce againſt thoſe that were to be put to death. We rather think therefore, that it meant ſome involuntary uncleanneſs; whether natural or contracted, which rendered her loathſome in his eyes, or unfit for the nuptial conſorts; which Chriſt therefore diſcommends in the goſpel, not only becauſe it was become o Deut. xxiv. 1, & ſeq.

(V) As plain as the import of the text is, yet the famous Hillel has found out a way to evade it, in order, to make divorce lawful even upon the ſlighteſt fault, ſuch as ſpoiling his meat in cooking; or according to Akkiba, another of the ſame looſe principles, if he finds another that pleaſes him better, or is more handſome in his eyes. To make this out, they divide the text thus: 1. If ſhe do not find favour in his ſight. And 2. if he find in her ערות דבר, Harvath dabar, or as the Septuagint render it Ἄσχημον χρῆμα, he may then divorce her. But the more virtuous ſchool of his co-rival Shammai, juſtly condemns ſuch a perverſe reading, tho' he confines this caſe of turpitude, which Moſes aſſigns as the ground of the huſband's diſlike, to the caſe of unchaſtity; whereas that of Hillel extends it to all that he may diſlike in her (21). This laſt has been moſt followed by the Jews, and ſufficiently condemned by Chriſt (22).

(21) Vide Gloſſ. Bartenor. הלכה בית חילל. (22) Matt. v. 32, & alib.

too frequent, and permitted upon every trivial occasion[p]; but also to assure the people, that the marriage knot was not to be dissolved, upon any pretence, except that of infidelity (W).

ONE thing, which shews that the nuptial breach was not thought the ground of a divorcement in David's time, is, that that monarch did not repudiate those concubines or wives of the second rank, whom his son Absalom had publicly debauched; but contented himself with shutting them up for life[q]; and that the Levite did not divorce his concubine-wife, as the text calls her, after she had played the harlot, and was run away from him; but went to seek and bring her home again[r]. The same may be said of Samson, who went and demanded his wife, after she had been given to another man[s]. To this we may add, that we do not find any instances, through the whole Old Testament, of men divorcing their wives, either upon this or any other account, except those who put away the strange women they had brought with them from the captivity[t]. However that be, 'tis plain, the Jews have understood it in another and more lax sense. The form of the bill of divorcement was to this effect: Such a day, month, and year, I such a one, of such a place, upon or near such a river, do of my own free consent and choice repudiate thee, such a one, my late wife, banish thee from me, and restore thee to thy own liberty, and thou mayest henceforth go whither, and marry whom thou wilt; and this is thy bill of divorcement, and writing of expulsion, according to the law of Moses and Israel. Signed by two witnesses; and delivered

[p] Vide JOSEPH. Ant. lib. iv. c. 8. & lib. de vit. sua ad fin. & PHIL. de special. legib. præc. 6. & 7. [q] 2 Sam. xx. 3. [r] Judg. xix. 1, & seq. [s] Ibid. xv. 1, & seq. [t] Ezr. x. | pass. Nehem xiii. 23, & seq.

(W) We may add, that the words (being ערות דבר, Harvath dabar, and not דבר ערות, Debar harvate, which last doth only signify the case of turpitude) may be more properly rendered, for any turpitude, or immodesty of words, discourse, or even behaviour. So that this indulgence might have been designed to deter the wanton sort of wives from such immodest speeches or behaviour, as might be apt to disgust a sober husband; and to inspire them with such chaste deportment as could alone preserve a true conjugal affection. According to this sense also our Saviour's reflection will be very just; that it was their indocible temper that extorted such an indulgence from Moses, which was manifestly contrary to the original design and institution of marriage.

in

in the preſence of as many at leaſt [u]. From this time the wife was as much at her liberty as if ſhe had been a widow; only in both caſes ſhe was obliged to ſtay at leaſt ninety days before ſhe was married to another, leſt ſhe ſhould prove pregnant by the laſt (X).

Laws againſt Theft.

Theft. UNDER this head we ſhall include not only thoſe which are againſt taking away another man's property, whether privately or by open force; but alſo againſt every act of fraud and injuſtice, which is contrary to the right and common faith of mankind. 1. As to theft, we have already obſerved, that the Jews underſtood the words in the decalogue, Thou ſhalt not ſteal [w], of men-ſtealing, and thought that the other ſort of theft was implied in the laſt precept, Thou ſhalt not covet †. But we ſhall include them under the ſame head.

[u] Vide Mos. KOTZ, fol, 133. & Mos. Ægypt. pt. ii. fol. 59. SELD. BUXT. & GOODW. ubi ſup. [w] Exod. xx. 15. † See Vol. II. p. 554. ſub fin. note (X).

(X) Touching the controverſy, whether women might likewiſe divorce their husbands, upon the ſame grounds that they might be divorced by them, we can only ſay, that we do not find any ſuch indulgence granted to them by Moſes, unleſs in the caſe of a virgin betrothed by her parents before ſhe was twelve years of age, who might then refuſe to ratify the contract which her parents had made, without giving any other reaſon, than that ſhe did not like the perſon deſigned for her; but this cannot be called a divorcement, becauſe there is no marriage in the caſe. Joſephus therefore thinks, that a divorce was ſo far from being permitted to women, that if the husband forſook his wife, it was not lawful for her to marry another, till ſhe had firſt obtained a divorce from him. He adds, that Salome, ſiſter to Herod the great, was the firſt who took upon her to repudiate her husband, whoſe example was ſoon followed by others, mentioned by the ſame author (23).

We omit ſeveral very prudent regulations made by the Talmudiſts, relating to the drawing up of theſe bills of divorcement, to prevent, as much as poſſible, all abuſes, forgeries, and counterfeits, ſuch as the kind of parchment, letter, and ink, which were to be uſed, how many letters to each line, and the like; beſides a great many other formalities, examinations, and enquiries, deſigned on purpoſe to draw the matter to ſuch a length, that the parties might have time to cool, and, if poſſible, to be reconciled.

(23) Ant. lib. xv. c. 11. xviii. 7. xx. 15, & in vit. ſua.

THE

THE ſtealing of a man was the only capital theft under the law of Moſes (Y); and whether the ſtolen perſons had been ſold, or were ſtill in the poſſeſſion of the thief, he was to be put to death [x]. All other theft was puniſhed by reſtitution, and the addition of a fine, according to the nature of the theft; only the man that broke into a houſe in the night to rob, might be impunely killed, though not in the day time [y]. He that ſtole an ox was to reſtore five oxen; if a ſheep or a goat, four ſheep or four goats [z]; but if he had neither killed nor ſold them, but they were found alive with him, he was only to pay two for one [a]. In caſe the thief had not wherewith to make ſatisfaction according to the law, it was lawful for the proſecutor, if he was an Iſraelite, to ſell him, but not if he was a proſelyte of any kind, neither could the former ſell him to any but to an Iſraelite. If he had a wife and children, they might likewiſe be ſold with him, till ſatisfaction was made to the offended; at leaſt it ſeems to have been ſo underſtood and practiſed by the Jews in caſes of debt, though Moſes mentions none here but the thief. This may be gathered from the words of the prophet Eliſha [b] to the widow; and from the parable in the goſpel, where the creditor commands the wife and children, as well as the inſolvent debtor, to be ſold, and payment to be made [c]. As ſoon as a ſufficient equivalent had been made by ſervitude, they were to be reſtored to their freedom again, though by another law [d] (Z): but if the thief was unmarried, and his maſter

[x] Exod. xxi. 16. [y] Ibid, xxii. 2. [z] Ibid. ver. 1. [a] Ibid. ver. 4. [b] 2 King. iv. 1. [c] Matt. xviii. 25. [d] Exod. xxii. 3.

(Y) The Jews, however, confine it to the ſtealing of an Iſraelite, and not without ſome ground, becauſe Moſes in another place (24) expreſſes it, if a man be found ſtealing any of his brethren of the children of Iſrael, which exception the Targum of Onkelos (25) and Septuagint have added alſo to the text in Exodus. Abenezra doth even underſtand it of children that cannot ſpeak. As for the ſtealing of ſtrangers, the offender was not to be put to death according to them, but only to make reſtitution.

(Z) The Talmudiſts have made ſeveral exceptions to this law: they ſay for inſtance, that the thief, that was ſold as inſolvent, was not bound to ſerve till he had repayed the four or five-fold, but only the equivalent of his theft. The overplus was remitted till he was in circumſtances to pay it. Neither could he be ſold, according

(24) Deut. xxiv. 7. (25) In Exod. xxi. 16.

maſter gave him a wife during the time of his ſervitude, the children that he had by her were his maſter's property: he could not demand them from him. From this law they hammered another more inhuman, in order to ſhorten a married man's ſervitude, by allowing him to beget a number of ſlaves, for the benefit of his creditor, upon ſome woman whom his maſter gave him; with this pretended proviſo however, that he ſhould not deprive his own wife of the nuptial due, or that ſhe ſhould conſent to forego it, and that only one maid-ſervant ſhould be conjoined to one ſuch man, not two or more. In caſes of petty larcenies the laws ſeem ſtill more indulgent, and the crime was not looked upon as infamous, according to that of Solomon, a thief is not deſpiſed that ſtealeth to ſatify his hunger; but if he be found, he ſhall reſtore ſeven-fold, he ſhall give all the ſubſtance of his houſe[e]; where the word ſeven-fold means only more or leſs, according to the theft, as far as his whole ſubſtance would reach. It is plain however, that the law of Moſes was far enough from countenancing ſuch kind of theft; ſince it allowed a ing to them, unleſs the theft was of greater value than the thief. Thus if the latter was judged worth fifty ſhekels, and the theft not above forty, it was not in the plaintiff's power to ſell him. A woman likewiſe that was guilty of theft, they pretend, could not be ſold, but yet they do not tell us what puniſhment was inflicted on her in caſe of inſolvency (26).

[e] Prov. vi. 30, 31.

There are however ſome texts of ſcripture which ſeem to imply a further puniſhment, than theſe we have mentioned. Jacob tells Laban, that upon whomſoever his ſtolen gods were found, he ſhould be put to death (27); and Solomon ſays, that he who is a partner with a thief hates his own ſoul or life (28). This made Eſtius of opinion, that they were whipped at the ſecond, and put to death after the third offence. But as to the firſt text, it being before the law of Moſes, it is ſuppoſed by the rabbies, that theft was capital by the laws of Noah, and the puniſhment exchanged for a milder by Moſes. As to the other, the moſt that can be made of the words is, that he is in danger of being killed if he ſteals with them in the night, or elſe of being tempted to forſwear himſelf, if he ſhould be examined upon oath, in which caſe, if he be found out, he will be put to death. So that from the tenor of Moſes's law it is plain, no theft but that of men was puniſhed with death.

(26) Ita Rabbin. fer. omn. (27) Gen. xxxi 32. (28) Prov. xxix. 24.

man

man in cases of extreme want to sell himself to some master for any term of years, even to that of the Jubilee [f]. He was even permitted to sell an unmarried daughter, upon condition, either that the buyer should marry her, or if he did not, that she should be redeemed by the highest bidder that would [g].

WHEN a man was suspected of theft, and the prosecutor had not sufficient proof against him, he might bring him before the judges, and have both him, and those whom he thought his accomplices, examined upon oath. If they swore themselves off, and could be afterwards proved forsworn, they were to be put to death, not for the theft, but for the perjury. The same law reached also to the receiver, or concealer, of stolen goods, knowing them to be such [h]: that is, if he was found out, he was fined as the thief, two, four, or five-fold; and being examined upon suspicion, if he denied his having the goods upon oath, he was put to death likewise: for so they understood the words, he shall bear his iniquity. All these kinds of matters were to be tried before the judges of the place where the fact was done, and it was left to them in many cases to appoint the fines and punishments of the offender, according to the nature and circumstances of the fact: only the Jews add, that if the thief came and accused himself, and restored the stolen goods, he was not to have any further punishment, because, say they, he was condemned not by the judges, but by himself [i]. Moses gave them also many other wholesome laws relating to things committed to another's care, or pledged for a time, such as cattle, houshold goods, garments, and the like, in case they came to be lost or damaged while they remained in that party's custody; how far in such cases he was or was not obliged to make satisfaction [k]; which we shall not dwell upon. Only thus much we may add, that in all cases, where any satisfaction was made, the person wronged, or his next heir, was the only person entitled to it, but if he died without heirs, then the priests might claim it as their due. He likewise forbad not only the use of false weights and measures [l], but also all kind of frauds, circumvention in contracts, whether written or verbal, both in merchandising

Injustice.

[f] Levit. xxv. 39, 40. [g] Exod. xxi. 7, & seq. [h] Levit. v. 1. [i] Vide MAIM. Tract. Genubah. lib. i. ex. Exod. xxii. 9. [k] Exod. xxii. 7. [l] Deut. xxv. 13, & seq.

and

and all other dealings between man and man [m] (A). Even in bargains, the rule was, that if the price was above one ſixth part more or leſs than the true value of the thing ſold, the party wronged might make the other refund the overplus. All kind of uſury, whether of money, grain, or of victual and apparel, was likewiſe forbid by the law of Moſes, in more places than one, from one Iſraelite to another; in which caſes the uſurer might be compelled by the judges to refund the ill-gotten wealth. They were commanded, on the contrary, whenever a brother was waxen poor, to ſupport and aſſiſt him with ſuch things as he needed, without propoſing to themſelves any other advantage by ſo doing, than the bleſſing of God attending it [n]. But of ſtrangers, that is, of the Gentiles, they were permitted to take ſome uſury [o]; yet ſo as not to oppreſs them by too great extortion, or indeed in any other way: for in ſuch caſes the ſtranger is put upon the ſame foot with the fatherleſs and the widow, whoſe protector God every where declares himſelf, with very ſevere threatnings againſt thoſe who were wanting in kindneſs and hoſpitality towards them [p]. Oppreſſing of ſervants and hirelings; defrauding, or even detaining of their wages, tho' but one night [q], denying them neceſſary food and reſpite [r]; private miſchiefs, ſuch as miſleading of the blind, or even another's cattle [s], removing of land-marks [t]; digging of pits, and leaving of them uncovered [u]; and many more of the like nature were likewiſe reckoned enormous crimes; which, if found out, were cogniſable by the judges, who were impow-

Uſury.

All kind of oppreſſion.

[m] Levit. xix. 11. xxv. 14, & alib. [n] Exod. xxii. 25, & ſeq. Lev. xxv. 36, & ſeq. Deut. xxiii. 19. [o] Ibid. ver. 20. [p] Exod. xxii. 21. xxiii. 9. Levit. xix. 33, & ſeq. & alib. [q] Levit. xix. 13. Deut. xxiv. 14, 15. [r] Ibid. xxv. 14. v. 4. [s] Levit. xix. 14. [t] Deut. xix. 14. [u] Exod. xxi. 33.

(A) Here the Jews, from a particular fondneſs for their own nation, make a great difference between the ſtrict juſtice which was due to an Iſraelite and to a Gentile, as well as the puniſhment inflicted on either ſide for the breach of it (29). But the more honeſt part of them, founding the interdiction of fraud and injuſtice on the law of nature, affirmed, that a Gentile ought not in any caſe to be defrauded or over-reached in negotiations, &c. becauſe, with reſpect to civil ſociety, he was to be accounted a neighbour, though not with reſpect to the privileges peculiar to the Iſraelites (30).

(29) Vide Gemar. Babyl. Tract. Sanhedr. Maim. גנובה גזילה and ואבידה (30) Vide Seld. ubi ſup. lib. vi. c. 5. & al.

ered to cauſe ſuitable ſatisfaction to be made, if not, there were terrible curſes denounced againſt the tranſgreſſors by God, from whoſe all-ſeeing eye they could not be concealed, and from whoſe juſtice they could not eſcape unpuniſhed. Taking of ſuch things in pledge from the needy, of which they ſtood in conſtant need, ſuch as their garments, their bed-cloaths, the nether or upper milſtone, and the like, was no leſs forbidden. The perſon ſo oppreſſed might appeal to the judge, and he cauſe them to be reſtored; but we do not find that any other puniſhment was ordained againſt the delinquent [w]. We omit ſeveral others of the ſame nature, which the reader may ſee among their negative precepts [x].

Laws againſt falſe Witneſs.

Falſe witneſs. THE foundation of them is in that of the decalogue, thou ſhalt not bear falſe witneſs againſt thy neighbour [y]; wherein we ſhall only obſerve, that the word, which our verſions render ſpeak, ſignifies, according to the original, to anſwer to an interrogation, ſuch as the judges exacted from perſons ſummoned to give evidence in any caſes that came before them, either by oath, or bare examination. The judges were bound to abide by the teſtimony of two or three witneſſes, eſpecially in capital caſes, a ſingle one not being ſufficient to condemn any man [z]. To deter men therefore, as much as poſſible, from giving falſe evidence, the law condemned a falſe witneſs to the ſame puniſhment which he would have inflicted on the innocent [a]; and if examined upon oath, and proved forſworn, he was to be put to death as was hinted before, let the caſe in queſtion be what it would. It required beſides of the judges, that they ſhould be very ſtrict in examining the witneſſes [b] (B), their character, and the nature of the evidence, in order to prevent, as far as poſſible, the guilty being acquitted, or the [w] Deut. xxiv. 6, 10, & ſeq. [x] Vide præc. 150, ad 196, & alib. paſſ. [y] Exod. xx. 16. xxiii. 2 Deut. v. 20. [z] Ibid. xvii. 6. [a] Deut. xix. 15, 16, & ſeq. [b] Ibid. ver. 18.

(B) The Jews excepted ſeveral perſons from being witneſſes, from a text in Exodus, (31), namely, perſons under age, thoſe who had committed any miſdemeanour which deſerved whipping, thieves, even after they had reſtored the ſtolen pelf, uſurers, extortioners, and ſuch like (32).

(31) Ch. xxiii. 1. (32) Præc. neg. 214.

innocent

innocent being condemned. The Talmudiſts have collected ſeveral laws relating to the duty of judges, which lie diſperſed in the writings of Moſes, and added ſeveral very judicious expoſitions, for which we ſhall refer the reader to the authors themſelves [c].

Laws againſt coveting another's property.

THE tenth precept of the decalogue, thou ſhalt not covet thy neighbour's houſe, wife, and ſo on [d], is juſtly eſteemed by the Jewiſh doctors, the prop and foundation of all the other laws of the ſecond table, and he that obſerves this, is in no danger of breaking the reſt. Whether the antient Jews underſtood it in that ſtrict and refined ſenſe which the goſpel doth, or only of ſuch overt acts as tended to the procuring of any thing by unlawful means, is not eaſy to determine. The Talmudiſts however do condemn by it the very deſire formed and indulged in the heart, tho' it doth not proceed to action [e].

An abridgment of ſome other mixt laws relating to food, raiment, planting, ſowing, decency and cleanneſs, and of ſuch diſeaſes as excluded men from common ſociety.

1. OF all the food that is forbidden by the Moſaic law, blood may be reckoned in the firſt place, becauſe its prohibition was as old as the deluge [f]; when God having, immediately after it, given Noah the liberty of eating the fleſh of animals, as is moſt generally ſuppoſed †, forbad the eating not only of the blood itſelf, but the fleſh alſo mixed with it, that is, of any animal, either ſtrangled or killed by any other way, than by drawing the blood thoroughly from it (C), under very ſevere threatnings. Againſt eating of blood.

[c] Tract. Sanhedr. MAIM. in eund. præc. neg. 194, ad 218.
[d] Exod. xx. 17. Deut. v. 21. [e] Vide præc. neg. 158. [f] Gen. ix. 4, & ſeq. † See Vol. I. p. 229.

(C) The reaſon given in the text is, that blood is the life of the animal; by which is meant, that no animal can live without it. But it is not improbable, that the end and deſign of this prohibition was, that it might be a kind of acknowledgment, that our privilege for killing, and eating the fleſh of thoſe living creatures, is not derived to us from the law of nature, which ſeems rather to be againſt it, but from an expreſs permiſſion from the author of nature. And this ſeems to be the reaſon threatnings. Accordingly we find it no leſs expreſly forbidden by Moſes in ſeveral places not only to the Iſraelites, but to the ſtrangers that lived among them [g]; even under pain of death. God ſeems even to put it on the level with ſacrificing one's ſeed to Moloch, when he threatens to ſet his face againſt him that tranſgreſſes in either caſe, which expreſſion is not uſed in any other prohibition. Only under this typical diſpenſation, God is pleaſed to give a new reaſon for this interdiction, namely, that it is the blood (which is alſo called the life) of the victim that makes atonement for ſin [h] (D); purſuant to which, the tabernacle, with ſon, why it was not only inforced by the Moſaic law, but alſo retained in the goſpel, and enjoined to its proſelytes from Gentiliſm (33). This law, we are told by a modern traveller (34), is ſtill ſtrictly obſerved by ſome eaſtern churches, not, as our author ſays, by virtue of the law of Moſes, but of the apoſtolic canon, which has been kept ever ſince by the eaſtern, and for ſeveral ages by the weſtern church, and confirmed by ſeveral councils from time to time.

[g] Levit. xvii. 10, & ſeq. Deut. xii. 23, & ſeq. [h] Levit. ubi ſup. ver. 11.

(D) The learned Maimon, not thinking theſe reaſons ſufficient, has fetched the origin of this prohibition from his old fountain of oppoſition to the Sabians, Amorites, and the other idolatrous nations, who, fancying blood to be the favourite food of Dæmons, contented themſelves with the fleſh of beaſts, and poured their blood into a veſſel, or a hole made in the ground, then ſitting and feaſting round it, imagined that thoſe Dæmons would come and take their ſhare of the feaſt. From this familiar converſation with their gods, they hoped to procure ſtill a nearer intercourſe with them in their dreams, by which they ſhould gain an inſight into futurity: ſo that according to him, and thoſe that have followed him (35), the main end of this prohibition was to prevent the worſhip of thoſe Dæmons. We need not to take notice how much more effectual the contrary method, that is, the allowing them to eat blood, would have been to have kept them from it; all that we ſhall obſerve here is, that, ſuppoſing this ſuperſtitious cuſtom and notion to have been as old as Moſes, it doth not appear to have been as old as the flood, or that any that came out of the ark were addicted to it, and yet it is to them that this prohibition was firſt made, if Moſes

(33) Vide Acts xv. 29. (34) Ludolph. Hiſt. Æthiop. lib. iii. c. 1. num. 51. (35) More Nevoch, p. 3. c. 46. Spenc. de Leg. Ritual. Gregor. in Oper. Poſt. vide Carlet. Concord. pt. i. c. 11.

may

with all its utenſils, was at firſt purified with it, the covenant between God and the people was ratified with it, and without blood there could be no remiſſion of ſin [i]; all which the apoſtle fitly applies to that of Chriſt under the goſpel [k].

NEXT to the blood, was forbidden likewiſe the fleſh of a conſiderable number of beaſts, fowls, fiſhes, and reptiles, which were therefore to be deemed unclean. This diſtinction however of clean and unclean can hardly be ſuppoſed to have its origin from the Moſaic law, and to have been uſed proleptically, when the divine hiſtorian mentions it even before the flood [l]: but we ſhall not repeat what has been ſaid on that ſubject in another place *; neither ſhall we enter into a nice ſcrutiny about thoſe animals thus forbidden, but refer the curious reader to the learned Bochart's elaborate treatiſe on that ſubject [m], and mention only the general rule which Moſes has given to diſtinguiſh the clean from the unclean [n].

meats.

OF beaſts whatever did both chew the cud and divide the hoof was to be reckoned clean, and whatever did not both theſe, as the ſwine, which dividedth the hoof but doth not chew the cud; or the camel, hare, rabbit, which chew the cud, and do not part the hoof, was forbidden as unclean. Of fowl all carnivorous birds, ſuch as the eagle, vulture, and the like; all that had four feet and yet flew, as the bat. Of fiſhes all that had fins and ſcales were lawful, and all that wanted either were forbidden. Of inſects all that had wings to raiſe itſelf from the earth might be eaten, but whatever did only crawl on the earth was unclean. Laſtly, the fat of the clean beaſts was forbidden, not becauſe it was unclean, much leſs becauſe it is hard of digeſtion, which is the reaſon which ſome authors give for this, and blood, and ſwine's, and other fleſh, being alſo forbid, ſeeing their laborious life and healthy conſtitution made them more capable to digeſt them, than many, among ours and other nations, who lead an indolent life, and yet can eat them all without any inconvenience. But the reaſon may be believed; and who knows how far it might in time contribute to this wild notion of the Sabians and Amorites, by making them fancy, that there was ſomething ſo ſacred in the blood of animals, that it was fit only for the gods?

[i] Hebr. ix. 22, & alib. paſſ. [k] Ibid. ver. 13, & ſeq.
[l] Gen. vii. 2. * See Vol. II. p. 229. [m] Hierozoic. paſſ.
[n] Levit. xi. 1, & ſeq.

is

is given in the text, namely, becauſe, in all ſacrifices, the fat was to be burnt on the altar, as appertaining unto God [o] (E). The fleſh of beaſts torn in pieces, or that died of themſelves, was likewiſe forbidden [p]. All that needs to be further added, with reſpect to unclean animals, is, that though the touch of them, while alive, was not defiling, yet that of their carcaſes was; inſomuch, that even the veſſels and liquors into which it fell, were made unclean by it; the liquors were to be thrown away, the veſſels, whatever they were, muſt be purified, and the perſon who touched them was to waſh himſelf, and be unclean until evening. A well however, a fountain, or any large receptacle of water, were not defiled by it, but only the perſon who took the unclean creature out of them [q].

Raiment. RAIMENT. Moſes hath left no poſitive laws relating to dreſs, except that which belonged to the prieſts, of which we have ſpoken elſewhere, and where he orders the people to wear blue fringes to the borders of their garments, [o] Vide Levit. iii. 14. & ſeq. [p] Exod. xxii. 31. Levit. xvii. 15. [q] Ibid. xi. 32, & ſeq.

(E) Joſephus however and the generality of the Jews underſtand this, not of the fat of all clean beaſts, but only of oxen, ſheep, and goats, and this is not only conformable to what is ſaid in another place (36); but, as theſe three creatures were the only ones that were ſacrificed to God, the deſign of the prohibition, mentioned above, ſeems naturally to confine it to them only. What ſeems to confirm, that the fat of other clean beaſts was permitted, is what Moſes ſays elſewhere, that the fat of a beaſt that dieth of itſelf, or is torn to death, may be put to any other uſe, but muſt not be eaten in any caſe (37); which ſeems to imply, that that of thoſe which were duely killed might be lawfully eaten. Neither is it reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that this prohibition extended to all the fat, for in ſuch a caſe a ſcrupulous Jew would ſcarce have found one bit in the whole beaſt that could be ſafely eaten; but only to that which is ſeparated from the fleſh ſuch as that which covers the kidneys, and the bowels, the caul, &c. After all we much doubt, whether even the interdict of this laſt extended farther than to that of victims offered to God. This ſeems at leaſt probable, from what follows after the forbidding to eat the fat of either ox, ſheep, or goat, where Moſes adds, whoſoever eateth the fat of the beaſt, of which men offer a burnt-offering unto the Lord——————ſhall be cut off——————(38).

(36) Levit vii. 23. (37) Ibid. ver. 24. (38) Ibid. ver. 25. Vide præc. reg. 138.

for

for a remembrance, that they were now no longer to live after their own will, but after the commands of God [r]. As to thoſe of the negative kind, the two moſt conſiderable are, thoſe which forbid the promiſcuous habit of both ſexes [s], and the wearing of two different ſtuffs, ſuch as linen and woollen, in the ſame garment [t]; the firſt is ſuppoſed to have been deſigned to prevent the ſhameful abuſes which might attend ſuch unnatural diſguiſes (F), and the ſecond to prevent confuſion. To the ſame purpoſe are thoſe which relate to ſowing divers ſeeds, or planting divers kinds of trees in the ſame field; or forbid to plow with a mixture of [r] Num. xv. 38, 39. Deut. xxii. 12. [s] Ibid. ver. 5. [t] Ibid. ver. 11.

(F) Interpreters fall into various other conjectures about the reaſon of this prohibition. Some think that Moſes had an eye to ſome Heathenish ceremonies, uſed at particular feſtivals, in which the people dreſſed themſelves in the habits of the contrary ſex, ſuch were for inſtance the Bacchanalia, and the feaſts of Mars and Venus. ſuch were alſo thoſe of the moon, and of the Cyprian goddeſs, which the men celebrated in womens habits, and the women in thoſe of men (39). Some have thought, that he meant to conceal under that prohibition an unnatural crime, which he was afraid to acquaint the people with, by calling it by its name, becauſe he adds, that ſuch diſguiſes are an abomination to God (40); but yet it is plain that he forbad ſodomy and beſtiality in as plain terms, as thoſe crimes could be couched in, and what other more abominable than theſe could be implyed by it we cannot gueſs. Laſtly, a far more conſiderable number after Joſephus underſtand it, not of an exchange of dreſs, but of occupations; that is, that the women ſhould not play the Amazon, or handle the ſword and ſpear which do properly belong to men; and that theſe, on the contrary, ſhould not buſy themſelves with ſuch occupations as were fitter for women (41). The terms of the original, upon which they build this notion, run literally thus: The כְּלִי Kele, by which they underſtand, weapons of a man ſhall not be upon a woman, and a man ſhall not put on the habit of a woman. But tho' Kele doth ſometimes ſignify weapons, and, in its primitive ſenſe, any kind of veſſels and inſtruments uſed in any buſineſs whatſoever, yet ſince it doth ſometimes ſignify dreſs and the ornaments of it, who doth not ſee, that the latter is an explication of the former, and conſequently, that it is levelled againſt the promiſcuous dreſs of ſexes?

(39) Lucian, Maimon. Jul. Firmic. Servius, & al. (40) Alberic. Gent. apud Calm. ſub voc. Habit. (41) Joſeph. Ant. lib. iv. c. 8. Chald. Paraph. Auguſt. Quæſt. 32. N. de Lyra, Vatab. Fag. Munſt. Tremel. & al.

cattle,

Cleanneſs. cattle, ſuch as an ox and an aſs [u]. Cleanneſs and decency, though ſo neceſſary in hot climes, that there needs hardly any law to inforce them, are yet enjoined by Moſes under ſevere penalties, as well as the neglect of thoſe proper ceremonies, which he had enjoined to thoſe who had laboured under any defilement, in order to their purification. We have already ſpoken of this latter under another head, and ſhall only mention the chief of the former; they were ſuch as forbid all matrimonial commerce for a certain time after child-birth, during the monthly periods, or after any accidental weakneſs of that kind; in men nocturnal pollutions, running ſores, ulcers, gonorrhæas, and ſuch like; whatever was touched by any perſon ſo defiled, whether chair, bed, table, or any other utenſil, was alſo to be deemed unclean, and to defile thoſe that touched them; and all were to be purified according to the law. In both ſexes likewiſe the touching of a dead body, carcaſe, or any unclean thing, had the ſame effect. But of all diſeaſes the leproſy (G) was reckoned [u] Ibid ver. 10.

(G) Moſes diſtinguiſhes three ſorts of leproſy, namely, that of the body, garments, and of houſes. The firſt of theſe is a cuticular diſeaſe, not unlike an inveterate itch or ſcurvy, which cauſes a violent itching, and, whether cauſed by ſome prolific animalcula communicated by the touch, or by corroſive vitrioline ſalts (tho' the former ſeems the moſt probable), will in time corrode the fleſh, even to the bone. We ſhall not diſguſt our readers with repeating the marks which he gives of that diſtemper (42); nor with what phyſicians have writ concerning it; but only obſerve, that it was of a much more corroſive and dangerous nature in hot climates than in cold ones. They obſerve three kinds or rather degrees of it. The firſt of theſe, namely, whilſt it is, as it were, in its infancy, may be eaſily cured: the ſecond, when it has communicated itſelf to the blood, cannot be maſtered without great difficulty, and a long regimen of diet and phyſic: the laſt, which is when it is grown inveterate, and has fixed itſelf, and corroded the ſolid parts, is reckoned incurable. However, Monſieur Tournefort, who had ſeen it in the Levant, thinks it rather a kind of a venereal diſeaſe, and that, if taken in time, it might be cured by the ſame method. And indeed the ſymptoms of this, of the leproſy, and of an inveterate ſcurvy are ſo alike, that unleſs a phyſician be very expert and cautious, he may eaſily condemn the innocent and abſolve the guilty. But be that as it will, it is certain, that this leproſy muſt have been ſufficiently known by the Iſraelites in reckoned the moſt defiling, for which reaſon thoſe who were infected with it were forced to live ſeparate from the reſt, till they had been cured of it; monarchs themſelves were not exempted from this law, as appears from the inſtance of king Azariah, or Uzziah, as he is called in the Chronicles, who, being ſmitten with that diſtemper for intruding into the prieſtly office [w], was deprived of his government, and forced to live apart to the day of his death. And indeed one kind of it was of ſo infectious a nature, Leproſy.

(42) Vide Levit. xiii. per tot.

[w] Comp. 2 King. xv. 5. & 2. Chron. xxvi. 16. & ſeq.

Egypt, ſince Moſes ſpeaks both of the diſeaſe and its marks, as of things which were plain and obvious.

The leproſy of the garments is ſuppoſed to have been owing to ſome defect in the management of the wool, ſkins, and ſtuffs, of which they were made; thoſe manufactures being then very imperfect, to what they have been ſince. The heat of the climate, and perhaps many other things, might contribute ſtill more towards it. Moſes has likewiſe deſcribed the marks of this kind of leproſy; they were ſpots either of a reddiſh or greeniſh hue, which appeared upon the garments, whether of linen, woollen, or of ſkins. In theſe caſes they were to be brought to the prieſts, and according as they appeared to them, they were either to be burnt, or to be waſhed and cleaned, or the ſpots to be cut out, and the reſt declared clean and wholeſome. This garment-leproſy is likewiſe ſuppoſed to be a kind of worm which breeds in thoſe ſtuffs, occaſioned by the oils, greaſe, and other ingredients uſed in the dreſſing of them.

The ſame may be ſaid of the leproſy of houſes, in the mortar and ſtones of which another ſort of vermin was bred, which had four jaws continually working, and eating holes in them. This was one of the tokens of its being infected, there were ſome others beſides, which were a kind of ruſt or ſcurf, that ſpread itſelf along the walls. In all theſe caſes, the prieſts were directed to ſhut the houſe up for a week, and it is probable, they made ſome kind of fumigation, during that time, though no mention is made of it, elſe we cannot ſee how the bare ſhutting it up could contribute to the cure. If upon the opening it again, they found the marks gone, they pronounced it clean, if not, they cauſed them to be ſcraped off every where, and the houſe to be ſhut up another ſeven days, and if that did not work the cure, they ordered it to be demoliſhed, and ſuch materials of it only to be preſerved, as were free from the infection, in order to build it up in ſome other place (43).

(43) Ibid. ver. 47. & ſeq. & xiv. Vide Journal de Scavants, ann. 1668. Calmet, Diſſert. præfix. at the head of his Comment on Levit.

that too much caution could not be uſed to prevent its ſpreading; inſomuch, that even thoſe that died of it were buried ſeparately from the reſt [x] (H); as for the other, namely, the dry one, it was rather an eye-ſore than an infectious diſeaſe. The prieſts were the proper judges both of the diſeaſe and of the cure; concerning which Moſes gave them ſeveral plain directions, tho' we find not, that he preſcribed any remedy againſt it, becauſe, as the Jews think, it was an immediate judgment from God [y]. The ſame they affirm alſo of the leproſy of houſes and garments; which they pretend was peculiar to the Iſraelites and to the land of Judæa [z], becauſe God had promiſed to them, that whilſt they continued obedient to his laws, their bodies, houſes, and garments, ſhould be preſerved from that diſeaſe; but when they proved ſtubborn and rebellious, he would ſend it as a puniſhment upon them [a].

WHEN the prieſt had pronounced a man infected with leproſy, he was not only ſecluded from the ſociety of clean perſons, but he was obliged to go bare-headed, with his cloaths rent, and his upper lip covered with a kind of muffler, to prevent, in all likelihood, his infecting others by his breath. But one may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that they had places in which they lived together, and made a kind of community among themſelves. Accordingly we read of four of them that went together out of ſome quarter of Samaria into the Aſſyrian camp, when the famine raged in the city [b]; and of ten in the goſpel, who applied themſelves in a body to Chriſt to be healed by him [c]. Perſons, garments, and houſes, being cured of this diſtemper, were to be further purified by the prieſt. We have already ſpoken of the ſacrifices, which were to be offered upon this occaſion, in its proper place. As for the other ceremonies which were enjoined by Moſes, we ſhall refer our reader to

[x] Ibid. ver. ult. Quæſt. 18. in Levit. SEPHARAD. & al.
[b] 2 King. vii. 3, 8.
[y] Ita Rabbin. fer. omn. & THEODOR.
[z] MOS. GERUND. RACANAT. ABR.
[a] Vide MUNST. in Levit. xiii. note (i).
[c] Luke xvii. 12.

(H) At leaſt this ſeems to have been the meaning of the text, though the words in the original are not ſo clear and expreſs. It would otherwiſe have been needleſs to have added that reaſon, becauſe he was a leper: ſo that one may reaſonably ſuppoſe, with the Septuagint and Vulgate, that they buried him in ſome corner of the ground where his anceſtors were depoſited, though apart from the reſt.

the

the two afore-quoted chapters of Leviticus, where if he pleaſes, he may ſee a full account of them.

BUT here we ſhall beg leave to mention a ſtory, which Manetho, and ſeveral other Heathen writers after him [d], have advanced with great appearance of ſerioufneſs, againſt the Jews; and which though every one of them tells in his own way, doth in the main amount to this: that the land of Egypt being grievouſly infected with the leproſy, and the king Bochorus, having conſulted the oracle, was adviſed to ſend all the lepers out of his dominions into a deſert place, where they might periſh with want. This was accordingly done, and they being come to the deſolate place, Moſes obſerved, by tracing the footſteps of a wild aſs, a ſpot where they might dig for water to refreſh their thirſt, and they, being revived with it, choſe him for their guide, and were by him conducted and ſettled in Canaan in the ſpace of ſeven days; in memory of which he ordered the ſeventh day to be a day of reſt, and forbad the eating of ſwine's fleſh, becauſe that creature is very ſubject to the leproſy. They add, that in memory of their kind benefactor, the aſs who ſaved their lives, he commanded an aſs's head to be ſet up and worſhipped in their temple. This ſtory, which is falſe in every particular, is likewiſe ridiculous, and as ſuch ſufficiently confuted by Joſephus; and the care, which Moſes took with reſpect to this diſtemper, ſufficiently ſhews, that at leaſt, the far greater part of the Iſraelites were free from it at their coming out of Egypt, elſe it would have been impoſſible to have ſegregated them from the reſt, and to have forced theſe laws upon them, which excluded them from the commerce of thoſe who were free from it.

THIS body of laws, out of which we have omitted a conſiderable number of leſs moment, beſides ſeveral others, which we have avoided repeating here, becauſe they have been occaſionally mentioned in other places, is not only ſecured by a clauſe which expreſly forbids the adding or diminiſhing any thing from it [e]; but their obedience to them is likewiſe enforced by the moſt cogent promiſes and threatnings, interſperſed through the whole, beſides a ſtrict charge to the Levites to inſtruct the people, and parents their children in it; though all too little to keep them to their duty.

[d] MANETH. ap. JOSEPH. cont. Apion. TACIT. JUST. EX TROG. PLUTARCH. & al [e] Deut. iv. 2. xii. 32.

Of the cuſtoms, learning, arts, and trade of the Jews.

Ceremonies at circumciſion.

THEIR cuſtoms, both religious and civil, being chiefly founded upon their laws, and the greateſt part of them having been already mentioned under that article, we ſhall have the leſs to ſay here, eſpecially conſidering the barrenneſs of the ſubject, for want of books and authors of a date old enough to be depended upon. We have already mentioned all that could be gathered concerning their cuſtoms at weddings and feſtivals; we ſhall now ſay ſomething of thoſe that were uſed at births and feaſts; to which we ſhall add a ſhort account of ſome of their abominable practices at their high-places, groves, and other places of idolatrous worſhip; of their various kinds of divinations, games, and ceremonies uſed at burials. It may be remembered, that circumciſion was not enjoined by the Moſaic law, but by virtue of the expreſs command given to Abraham. But neither that nor this hath ordained any thing, either with reſpect to the perſon by whom, nor with what inſtrument, nor in what manner, the ceremony was to be performed, but only that the foreſkin ſhould be cut off on the eighth day. So that it was left to the option of the parent, either to perform it himſelf, or to have ſome other perſon, whether a prieſt, ſurgeon, or any expert friend, to do it for him. And in this laſt caſe, it was always looked upon as a high compliment to be choſen to that office. The inſtrument was generally a knife or razor made of ſome kind of ſtone, as being leſs dangerous than thoſe of ſteel †; the uſe of which they might have learned from the Egyptians, who opened thoſe bodies with them, which were to be embalmed ‡. They were not obliged to carry the child to the ſynagogue, much leſs to the temple, but had him circumciſed at home. Here the father, or ſome friend deputed by him, held the child in his arms, whilſt the operator took the prepuce either with one hand, or with pincers made for the purpoſe, and with the other cut off the foreſkin, whilſt another held a porringer filled with ſand, for him to fling it in, and to receive the blood that dropped. He then applied his mouth to the place, and having ſucked the blood, which generally flowed plentifully, twice or thrice, and ſpit it out into a tumbler of wine, he threw ſome ſtiptic powder upon the wound, and dreſſed it till it was well. As for the form of words that were uſed upon ſuch occaſions, as far as probable conjectures will go, we have had occaſion to mention it under a former article,

† See before, p. 64. ‡ HERODOT. lib. ii. c. 86.

cle *, to which they added, no doubt, ſome prayers and bleſſings. At preſent, the operator, having dreſſed the wound, puts the cup of wine and blood to the infant's lips, pronouncing theſe words of the prophet, live in thy blood [g], repeats the 128th pſalm, and wiſhes his parents joy, and that they may thus aſſiſt at his wedding . But how old theſe cuſtoms are we cannot warrant; all that can be added is, that this ceremony was uſually accompanied with great rejoicing and feaſting; and it was at that time, that the child uſed uſed to be named by the parents, in the preſence of the company [h] (I). Theſe

* See Vol. II. p. 501, note (A). [g] Ezek. xvi. 6.
 De his vide FAG. in Deut. x. Mos. KOTZ, in Tract. de Circumciſ. fol. 115. MAIM. Tract. Circumciſ. c. 1 & 2. BUXTORF. Syn. Jud. c. 4, & alib. QUANDT. de Cultris Circumciſ. Hebr. [h] Luke i. 59.

(I) The Jews did afterwards add ſeveral other ſuperſtitious cuſtoms, ſuch as placing three ſtools, one for the circumciſer, the ſecond for the perſon that held the child, and the third for Elijah, who, they ſay, aſſiſted inviſibly at the ceremony (44); writing the words Adam and Eve, Lillith, be gone hence, upon pieces of parchment, and ſticking them to the four walls of the room, as alſo the names of three friendly angels, to preſerve the child from the power of Lillith, who, according to them, was Adam's firſt wife, and being parted from him, uſed to vent her ſpleen againſt women in child birth, and new-born children, eſpecially males (45). They had likewiſe taken it into their heads to circumciſe children after their death, if they had not been ſo before, in order to avoid the curſe pronounced againſt thoſe that neglected it, and which had like to have fallen upon Moſes at the inn (46), but they content themſelves now with cutting off the prepuce, and flinging it into the coffin or grave with the body. But theſe the wiſer ſort among them have long ſince diſuſed, as ridiculous and ſuperſtitious. The cuſtom of godfathers, or, as they call them, בעל ברית, Baal-berith, maſter of the covenant, has been of antient uſe (47); his office was to hold the child, during the operation. They think that Uriah the high-prieſt, and Zechariah, the ſon of Jeberechiah, ſtood godfathers to Iſaiah's ſon Maher-ſhalal-haſh-baz (48). As for the operation, Maimon (49) tells us, that all had a right to it, even an uncircumciſed ſervant, or a woman, &c. in the abſence of a man, unleſs ſhe be a Gentile; though even if ſuch a one ſhould perform the operation, it needs not to be repeated. And Moſes

(44) Vide Chriſt. Caſt. in Malach. iv. (45) Vide Leo de Mod. pt. iv. c. 8. (46) Exod. iv. 24. See Vol. II. p. 501, note (A). (47) Vide Elia. Thisbit. in סנדק. (48) Vide Jun. & Tremel. in Iſai. viii. (49) Tract. מילה, p. 114.

Kotz

Theſe names, how harſh ſoever they may ſound in our ears, were generally ſignificant of ſomething relating to the parents, or the child, or to ſome other circumſtances of time. We have already given ſome inſtances of it in thoſe of the patriarchs. The devouter part uſed to tack the names of God, Jah and El, to that of the child, thus, Abijah ſignifies God my father; and Zechariah, the memorial of the Lord: Uzziel and Daniel, the ſtrength or judgment of God. Some had a quite different meaning, as Iſhboſheth, the man of ſhame; Mephiboſheth, ſhame of the mouth. Others were taken from living creatures; Tzipor, a bird; Rachel, a ſheep; Chamor, an Aſs; Nachaſh, a ſerpent; Tamar, a palm tree, and the like; and Eli's daughter-in-law called her ſon Ichabod, where is the glory, when ſhe heard, that the ark was taken by the Philiſtines ǂ†ǂ. As for daughters, as they were not circumciſed, ſo there was no other ceremony uſed, that we can find, than giving them a name, unleſs it were, that when the mother was purified, the prieſts did beſtow a bleſſing upon the child, as well as upon the parents, as it is uſed to this day [1].

At their feaſts. THEIR feaſtings (if we except thoſe that were commanded or permitted by the law, or uſed at births, marriages, and ſuch like occaſions) (K), were neither many nor ſumptuous, becauſe theſe came ſo often about, and laſted ſo long, that they could hardly have time for more. As for the cuſtoms and ceremonies uſed at them, we ſhall only pick out ſuch as bear an analogy with any paſſages in the goſpel. Theſe were the ſaluting of the gueſts, waſhing their feet, anointing

ǂ†ǂ 1 Sam. iv. 21. [1] LEO DE MODEN. Cerem. Jud. pt. iv. c. 8. GOODWIN's Moſ. & Aar. lib. vi. c. 1.

Kotz adds out of the Talmud, that in caſe the parents neglected to circumciſe their children, the judges, as ſoon as they were informed of it, were bound to ſee it done; which if they did not, when the perſon came to age, he was to get it performed out of hand, becauſe every day he lived uncircumciſed from that time, he was a tranſgreſſor of the law (50)

(K) Their religious feaſtings were called חג, Chagg, from חגג, to celebrate; the others, if ſumptuous and ſplendid, were called משתה, Miſhtah, from שתה, Shatah, to drink or carouſe, and anſwered to the συμπόσιον and συμπόσιον of the Greeks, becauſe it was a main part of the banquet (51); but if it was only a moderate one, they called it ארוחה, Aruchah, that is, a viaticum, or way-bit, from ארח, Arach, to journey (52).

(50) Ibid. fol. 104. (51) Vide Gen. xliii. 34. (52) Vide Jerem xl. 5. Prov. xv. 17.

with

with oil, the grace or bleſſing of the cup, and breaking of the bread, giving of thanks, and diſmiſſing the company. The firſt ſalutation was performed to ſuperiors, by bowing down to the ground, as Abraham and Lot did to their heavenly gueſts [k], or by a kiſs or embrace to a familiar (L). In the two former inſtances, we have likewiſe a form of invitation, and the ceremony of waſhing the feet, which Joſeph ordered alſo to be performed to his brethren, when they came to dine with him in Egypt [l]; and thus Abigail in her great modeſty anſwered David's ſervants, who came to propoſe marriage from him, "Let the handmaid of my lord the king "be a ſervant to waſh the feet of the king's ſervants [m];" and to this cuſtom no doubt the pſalmiſt alludes, when he calls Moab his waſh-pot [n]. As for the ceremony of anointing the head, though it was common in all the eaſt, yet we find no inſtance of it before the goſpel [o], except in that alluſion of the pſalmiſt [p], thou haſt prepared a table for me ---- thou haſt anointed my head with oil. Waſhing the feet.

THESE firſt ceremonies being over, the maſter of the houſe began to crave a bleſſing, if there was no ſtranger, nor any perſon of a ſuperior rank [q], for in this caſe he complimented him with that office (M). He then took a cup full of wine, and having bleſſed the creator of the vine, he ſipped a little of it, and gave it to the next perſon, till it had gone round. This was called the ברכת היין, Birkath hajajin, the bleſſing of the wine. Our ſaviour is obſerved by St. Luke Bleſſing.

[k] Gen. xviii. 2. xix. 1. [l] Gen. xliii. 24. [m] 1 Sam. xxv. 41. [n] Pſ. cviii. [o] Matt. xxvi. 7. Luke vii. 46. [p] Pſ. xxiii. 5. [q] Vide 1 Sam. ix. 13.

(L) Theſe two ceremonies were alſo uſed upon all other occaſions; thus Nathan and Araunah bowed to David, and Obadiah to Elijah (53); and thus Eſau embraced and kiſſed his brother Jacob, and Moſes his father-in-law (54). Our Saviour alſo in the goſpel alludes to this and the other two ceremonies of reception, namely, waſhing and anointing, when he reproves the phariſee for having omitted them towards him (55); and himſelf we find waſhed his diſciples feet at his laſt ſupper (56).

(M) This was not to be refuſed upon any pretence, for they believed, that he who refuſed to crave a bleſſing ſhortened his own days. But the maſter of the houſe was allowed by way of civility to ſet even an inferior to perform that office (57).

(53) 2 Sam. xxiv. 20. 1 Kings i. 23. xviii. 7. (54) Gen. xxxiii. 4. Exod. xviii. 7. (55) Luke vii. 44, & ſeq. (56) John xiii. 4, & ſeq. (57) Joſ. Karo. Shulchan barukh, n. 201.

to

to have began with it, and distributed it among the twelve, at his last supper [r]. From thence he passed to the blessing, and breaking of the bread, and distributing it to the guests. This is what Christ likewise did to the Apostles, and it was called the blessing of the bread [s]. As soon as they had done eating, the same person, who had craved the blessing, was obliged to give thanks, in which all the rest joined with him. It was concluded with another cup full of wine, and this was called the blessing of plenty. Our saviour is supposed to have instituted the sacrament in this last cup [t] (N). However, it is likely, that some of these last ceremonies were only used at some of their grand festivals, especially that of the passover; though the first was seldom, if ever, omitted. Whether their custom was to sit at meat, or lie down, is a controversy of more nicety than moment. However, to us the former seems most probable, at least before the captivity. We read, that Joseph made his brethren sit down to eat with him [u], and David said to Jonathan, To-morrow - - - - I should sit, or as the original has it, sitting, I should sit down at meat with the king [x]; though we own, that in our Saviour's time the custom was altered into that of lying down (O). That of pulling off their

Sitting down.

[r] Luke xxii. 17. [s] Vide DRUS in Nov. Test. pt. ult. & GOODW. ubi supr. l. 3. c. 2. § 15. [t] Vide FAG. in præc. Hebr. [u] Gen. xliii. 33. [x] 1 Sam. xx. 5.

(N) In this cup of thanksgiving they blessed God. 1. For the present refreshment. 2. For their deliverance out of Egypt. 3. For the covenant of circumcision: and 4. For the law given by Moses. After this they prayed, that God would be merciful, 1. To his people Israel. 2. To his Jerusalem. 3. To his Sion, the residence of his majesty. 4. To the kingdom of David. 5. That he would send the prophet Elijah. And 6. That he would make them worthy of the kingdom of the Messiah. The ceremony ended with a psalm proper to the occasion. They have added since several other niceties not worth mentioning (58). It is plain however, that some of these ceremonies were added since the captivity, and we dare not take upon us to say, how many of the others were in use before that time; but we hope the affinity they bear to some of the gospel institutions will be apology sufficient for our taking notice of them here.

(O) The verb is ישב, Jashab, which is always used for sitting at meat, on a throne, and the like, and is, as we think, incapable of the other meaning, which is always expressed by that of שכב, Shacab. As to their tables, they seem to have been of a round

(58) Vid. Seb. Munst. in Matt. xxvi.

their ſhoes or ſandals ſeems implied in the command of eating the paſſover with them on. We ſhall only add, that upon theſe and all ſuch occaſions, hoſpitality and liberality had been ſo ſtrongly recommended to them by their law-giver, and enforced by the examples of Abraham, Lot, and other patriarchs, and the many bleſſings attending it, that they became very conſpicuous for it, ſeldom or never failing, at ſuch times eſpecially, to make the Levites, the fatherleſs, widows, and ſtrangers, partakers of their joy, by inviting them to the feaſt, or ſending them ſome portions of their good cheer.

THEIR high places were of two ſorts, either thoſe where they only worſhipped the true God, by burning incenſe and offering ſacrifices to him; or ſuch in which they ſerved ſtrange gods, and committed the moſt horrid wickedneſs in their worſhip. Both theſe became ſo common and univerſal, that we read but of few kings who had the courage to pull them down; whilſt many others, tho' otherwiſe commended for their piety and zeal, are yet recorded for having left this evil unreformed. The firſt of theſe, tho' leſs criminal, and ſeemingly countenanced by the examples of Samuel, David, Eliſha, and other inſpired perſons, were nevertheleſs expreſly forbidden by God, unleſs it were done by his own command, as we have ſeen elſewhere †: but as to the laſt, it is certain, nothing could be more expreſly forbid, or more ſeverely threatened, we may ſay puniſhed; notwithſtanding which, Joſhua had been ſcarcely dead above twenty years, ere they began to relapſe into it [y]. This defection began about the times of Othniel and Ehud, and increaſed ſo faſt, and ſpread ſo wide, that it would be endleſs to enumerate their falſe deities, and the places dedicated to their worſhip, as well as the abominable ceremonies which were practiſed in them. But our deſign is not to dwell upon this ſubject, having already ſpoken High places.

† See before p. 289. note (H). [y] Vide Judg. iii. 5, & ſeq.

round or oval figure, becauſe it is often joined to the verb סבב, Savaſ, to ſurround, to ſit or ſtand round. Thus it is ſaid by Samuel (59) לא נסב, we will not ſit down till he come; and the pſalmiſt ſays, thy children ſhall be like olive branches round about thy table (60). We do not pretend indeed, that this Argument is altogether concluſive, ſeeing the word סביב, Saviſ, round about, is made uſe of by Moſes, where he ſpeaks of a ſquare table, as when he commands the prieſts to ſprinkle the blood of the victim round about the altar, tho' it was of a ſquare form (61).

(59) 1 Sam, xvi. 11. (60) Pſ. cxxviii 3. (61) Conf. Levit. i. 5. & 11. & Exod. xxvii. 1.

of it in the hiſtories of thoſe nations, from whom they adopted them. It will be ſufficient to obſerve upon the whole, that they adopted the falſe gods of all thoſe nations, in the midſt of whom they lived, and ſet up altars and idols to them upon every hill and high place, from which they came to be called by that name; that the ſun, moon and ſtars were of the number of their deities, and that, as the rites of thoſe falſe deities became more and more ſhameful, and unfit for common view, they betook themſelves to ſet up tents and booths, and to plant groves, to conceal the abominable things that were done in them; the very women, who were become uſeleſs in that helliſh commerce, finding out a way of proſtituting themſelves, as it were, at ſecond hand, by furniſhing the infamous votaries with all kind of conveniencies [z]. Solomon is juſtly branded in ſcripture for having brought this evil to its height, by the multitude of his ſtrange women, and which was never thoroughly rooted out till Joſiah's reign, that is about 360 years after [a].

Divinations.

BESIDES theſe abominable idolatries, or rather in conſequence of them, they gave themſelves up to all kinds of divinations and witcheries practiſed among the Heathen, tho' as expreſly and diſtinctly forbid by the law of Moſes as the former. Theſe were of various kinds. Moſes expreſſes them in the terms following [b], There ſhall not be found among you any one that maketh his ſon or his daughter to paſs through the fire, or that uſeth divination, or an obſerver of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a conſulter with familiar ſpirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer (P). To theſe the [z] 1 King. iii. 2, & ſeq, xii. 28, & ſeq. xiv. 23, 24, & alib. paſſ.

[a] Comp. 1 King. xi. 1 & ſeq. & 2 King. xxiii 4. & ſeq. [b] Deut. xviii. 10, 11.

(P) We need not doubt but there might be many more of the like nature. But the moſt inhuman of all was that of paſſing their children thro' the fire. This rite ſeems to have been peculiar to Molech, who is therefore alſo called ענמלך, Anamelech, from ענה Anah, to anſwer, becauſe he gave anſwers to thoſe who conſulted him by this rite, either by his prieſts, or by dreams (62). We ſhall not attempt to deſcribe thoſe various kinds of divination, either from the text, or from commentators, but only obſerve in general, that the chief of them were performed, firſt, by conſulting the ſtars, clouds, ſigns, tokens, and the like. This ſeems the meaning of the word מנחש Mena-

(62) Vide Maim. & Abarban. in Leg. 170.

cheſh,

the prophets have added ſome few others, ſuch as conſulting by Teraphims, and by the flight of arrows, by the liver of beaſts [c], by ſtocks, and ſtaves [d], and ſuch like; ſeveral of which were even forbid under pain of death. But ſuch was their invincible itch of prying into futurity, that they left cheſh here, which is nevertheleſs ſometimes uſed in a good ſenſe. Thus Laban ſays to Jacob, נחשתי, Nachaſhti, I have obſerved or experienced, that God has bleſſed me for thy ſake (63); Joſeph makes uſe of the ſame verb, ſpeaking of his divining cup (64); but we much doubt, whether this is capable of ſo favourable a ſenſe. However, as the word נחש ſignifies properly a ſerpent; Bochart has alſo given us an account of ſeveral divinations that were performed by means of thoſe creatures †. 2. Another way was by familiar ſpirits, which the Hebrew calls אובות, Oboth, ſuch as the witch of Endor is ſaid to have had, 3. דורש אל המתים, interrogating the dead, which the Septuagint render ἐπερώτων τοὺς νεκρούς. This is what the ſame witch did for Saul, from which one would be apt to conclude theſe two to be much the ſame. 4. The מכשף Mekaſheph, may be properly enough rendered by Leger-de-main, one who deceives the ſight, and impoſes upon the beholders; ſuch are reaſonably ſuppoſed thoſe whom Pharaoh ſet againſt Moſes (65), who are there called מכשפים, Makſhaphim, and are ſaid to have imitated ſome of his wonders בלהטיהם, Belahatthem, which word ſeems derived from להט, which ſignifies a flame, or the glittering of a ſpear, or lance, becauſe it dazzles the ſight. The Septuagint however have tranſlated it Φάρμακοις, Apothecaries, from whence the Latin, Veneſica, Poiſoner. 5. The חובר Chover may alſo be properly rendered a Mutterer, from חבר, to gather, couple, or aſſociate, becauſe he ſpeaks with his lips joined (66), and is therefore rendered רטין by Onkelos. Bodinus doth indeed think it rather becauſe ſuch a one aſſociates himſelf with evil ſpirits by compact (67), and he tells us accordingly in another place, that an infant, by pronouncing a certain verſe out of the Pſalms, ſhall prevent a woman's churning her butter, and, by repeating the ſame verſe backward, ſhall cauſe it to come immediately (68). The learned Maimon (69) tells us of a great many other wonderful pranks that are done by theſe חברים, Mutterers, of whom however the pſalmiſt ſays, that they cannot charm the deaf adder, though never ſo ſkilled in their art (70). The other kinds of præſtigiators, being ſtill more obſcure and inconſiderable, we purpoſedly omit.

[c] Exek. xxi. 21. [d] Hoſ. iv. 12.

(63) Gen. xxx. 27. (64) Ibid. xliv. 5, 15. † Hieroxoic. lib. i. c. 3. pt. 1. (65) Exod, vii. 11. & alib. paſſ. (66) Beker. Monde enchanté. (67) Dæmon. Magic. lib. i. c. 6. (68) Lib. ii. c. 1. (69) עב רה נרה, c. xi. § 10, 11. (70) Pſ. lviii. 5.

none of them untryed, at leaſt the prophets do generally upbraid them with reſorting to thoſe who practiſed them.

Games. GAMES may, for ought appears, be ſaid to have been the only cuſtom, in which they did not imitate their neighbours, at leaſt, which they did not introduce into their common-wealth. They had not ſo much as a name for them, but what doth properly ſignify to laugh [e], play [f], toy [g], and ſuch like innocent amuſements. Even Solomon himſelf, who had imitated, or rather out-done, the grandeur of other kingdoms, and had indulged himſelf in all other vanities, or what he calls the delights of the ſons of men [h], ſome of which were near of kin to theſe, as his ſingers and muſicians of both ſexes; doth yet make no mention of any kind of games, either of hazard, or of the theatre; the ſcriptures do no where ſpeak of them (Q). It ſeems rather, that their ſolemn feſtivals ſerved them inſtead of all ſuch kind of ſpectacles and diverſions; and indeed, if we conſider the frequency and magnificence of them, eſpecially after the building of the temple, we ſhall not need to wonder at their preferring them to any others. Add to this, that all that we meet with in the writings of the antient fathers, ſuch as Tertullian [i], and St. Cyprian both in his ſecond epiſtle to Donatus, and in his book De Spectaculis, if that piece be really his, which is ſomewhat

[e] Vide Gen. xviii. 19, & alib. paſſ. [f] Exod. xxxii. 6. Judg. xvi. 25, & alib. [g] Gen. xxvi. 8. [h] Eccleſiaſt. ii. 8. [i] Lib. de Spectac. & apolog. c. 38.

(Q) If we may believe the Talmudiſts and other Jewiſh commentators, all kinds of games, ſpectacles, &c. were not only forbid, but abhorred, by all good Iſraelites, by reaſon of the miſchiefs which had befallen thoſe who had ventured to be preſent at thoſe of their neighbouring nations. The Talmud uttterly condemns being preſent at any theatrical repreſentations (71); they give ſeveral reaſons which we ſhall omit, becauſe they are not over modeſt; and R. Simeon Ben-paki is there affirmed to have rendered the firſt words of the firſt pſalm, Bleſſed is the man who hath not ſet his foot in a theatre, &c. The comment on the book of Ruth introduces old Naomi, diſſuading her daughter-in-law from returning into the land of Iſrael, becauſe it was not the cuſtom of the daughters of it to go to the theatres and other ſpectacles of the Gentiles (72); and the large comment on the Lamentations introduces the Jewiſh church expoſtulating with God, that it had never entered into any ſuch profane places (73).

(71) Tract. עבודה זרה, fol. 18. (72) Middr. in Ruth. c. 1. (73) איכה רבה, fol. 5. col. 4.

doubtful

doubtful, by reaſon of the difference of ſtyle; all agree in this, that the Iſraelites never admitted any ſuch games among them. It even appears from Mr. Selden, that games of hazard, ſuch as dice-tables and the like, were looked upon as a kind of theft, no gain being thought lawful, that reſulted from a contract which depended upon chance. The ſame they likewiſe affirmed of ſuch who made a gain of expoſing beaſts or fowls to fight one with another [k].

Diverſions.

As to their diverſions, they ſeem to have conſiſted chiefly in eating, drinking, dancing, and muſic. At leaſt they are thoſe which good old Barzillai ſeems to bewail his incapacity for [l], and for the exceſs of which they were often blamed by the prophets [m]. The ſcriptures do often expreſs the ſimplicity of their happy lives, by ſitting, and eating, and drinking, every one under his vine, and under his fig-tree. But even theſe diverſions could not be very frequent, unleſs it were upon ſuch ſolemn occaſions as we have mentioned before, or at their ſheep-ſhearing, harveſt, and vintage; becauſe they would elſe have had but little time to have minded their country affairs. Whether they uſed hunting, fowling, fiſhing, and ſuch like, by way of diverſion, or rather to furniſh their tables now and then with an uncommon diſh, and to preſerve their fields, orchards, and vineyards, from being ſpoiled by thoſe creatures, we will not pretend to ſay, but we find frequent mention made of nets, gins, traps, fowlers, hunters, and ſuch like.

Diet.

THEIR diet, except on feſtivals ſeems to have been very plain. Boaz, a mighty man, complimented Ruth with drinking of the ſame water, eating of the ſame bread, and dipping her marſel in the vinegar with him [n]. Even the preſent of victuals which were brought to David and his men, whilſt he was in a kind of exile, were chiefly ſeveral kinds of pulſe, ſome parched corn, bread, and flour, ſome dried raiſins and figs, honey, butter, cheeſe, oil, and a few fatted beaſts [o]. Their bread was made either of barley or wheat, baked into thin cakes, ſome in ovens, ſome upon the hearth, and others in a frying-pan, ſome with, and ſome without, oil; they often uſed parched corn inſtead of bread. Honey was commended for its deliciouſneſs [p], and the fleece of the flocks and the milk of the goats were thought by the wiſe man ſufficient for food and raiment, both for the maſter and his family [q].

[k] Jus. Nat. & gent. lib. vi. c. 11. [l] 2 Sam. xix. 35. [m] Iſai. v. 11, 12. Amos vi. 3, & ſeq. [n] Ruth ii. 9, 14. [o] 1 Sam. xxv. 18. 2 Sam. xvi. 1. xvii. 28, 29. & alib. [p] Vide Pſ. xix. 10, & alib. paſſ. [q] Prov. xxvii. 26, 27.

Titles. HIGH titles were unknown amongſt them, unleſs thoſe which implied ſome office, ſuch as general, treaſurer, recorder and the like. They valued themſelves more upon their genealogies, which is the reaſon why one man's name had five or ſix of his anceſtors, and ſometimes more, tacked to it. Some regard was likewiſe had to the diſtinction of tribes or families; as for inſtance, to thoſe of the prieſts and Levites, upon a religious account, to that of Judah, by reaſon of the ſceptre being promiſed to it, and to that of Ephraim, out of reſpect to Joſeph's memory. The ſame reſpect was likewiſe paid in every tribe to thoſe who were the heads or fathers of it, and to all the elder branches in general. Next to theſe, old men, of what tribe or branch ſoever, were had in great veneration. The name of oldman, or elder, as our verſion renders it, ſeems all along to imply ſomething of dignity in the Moſaic writings, and their experience and gravity ſeems to have intitled them to be the proper perſons to take cogniſance, and to judge of all important matters, in the places where they dwelt, as well as to the reſpect of the younger ſort upon that account. But this reſpect did not conſiſt in giving them, or indeed to any man, how great ſoever, the king excepted, any pompous title; but in a ſubmiſſive approach and behaviour, and in a reſpectful phraſe peculiar to the Hebrew; in which, though the ſecond perſon was always uſed even to a prince, yet the ſpeaker always expreſſed himſelf in the third, with the addition of ſervant or handmaid: let thy ſervant ſpeak a word, inſtead of, let me ſpeak----behold thy ſervant or handmaid, for here am I. The women, whether becauſe they were more baſhful and timerous, or perhaps greater flatterers, were ſtill more remarkable for the modeſt turn of their expreſſions, and the humbleneſs of their behaviour **.

THEIR laborious and frugal lives, and the healthfulneſs of the country, were effectual means to prevent a vaſt number of thoſe diſeaſes, which have been ſince uſhered into the world by luxury and ſloth. It is for this reaſon, that we read of ſo few, if any, diſeaſes among them, much leſs of phyſicians, except ſuch as are now known by the name of ſurgeons, whom the antient Grecks, as well as the Hebrews, called phyſicians or healers. Thus the Moſaic law condemned the man who wounded another to pay, amongſt other things, the ſalary of the phyſician. Such were thoſe whom king Aſa is blamed for his too great confidence in, when he laboured with a diſtemper in his feet, which the generality of interpreters take to have been a kind of gout; and whoſe skill extended no farther than outward applications; for we read nothing in the ſacred books of purges, ſweats, vomits, diet-drinks, and other ſuch evacuating medicines, though often of plaiſters, ointments, bandages, and ſuch like. This ſeems indeed the reaſon of their living ſo long, as well as of their being ſo healthy and fruitful, even to the end of their lives.

 Vide Ruth ii. 13. 1. Sam. i. 15, 16. xxv. 23, & ſeq. & alib.

THEIR mourning was either for the death of their near relations, or for any misfortunes, either public or private; and was expreſſed in both caſes much after the ſame manner; not with ſuch formalities as are uſed among us, which hardly reach beyond the outſide; but by ſuch as expreſſed all the tokens of an inward grief, or at leaſt would be apt to cauſe a real one in thoſe, who were obliged to go through ſuch a ſeries of mournful ceremonies. The firſt ſallies of it were followed by rending their cloaths, uncovering their heads, ſmiting their breaſts, tearing their hair and beards, putting aſhes and dirt upon their heads, inſtead of perfumes (which were quite laid aſide all the time of mourning), going barefoot, putting on ſackcloth next the skin, lying upon the bare ground, and the like[r]. The neighbouring nations had ſtill more violent ways of expreſſing their grief, by pricking, cutting, and ſcarifying themſelves; but theſe were expreſly forbid by the law of Moſes[f]. As ſoon as theſe firſt fits of grief were ended, they changed their cloaths for others that were ſtreighter, coarſer, dirtier, and more ragged. They covered their faces with their upper garment to hide their tears; they faſted till ſunet, and then contented themſelves with the plaineſt diet; they ſkept a profound ſilence, which they never broke, but to utter ſome groans or complaints, or at moſt ſome doleful lamentation[t]. Some did even chooſe to lie in the aſhes, or on a dunghill, and to avoid the ſight of any light. This mourning laſted longer or ſhorter, according to the occaſion; and when it happened for the death of a conſiderable perſon, even a whole month, as was done for Moſes and Aaron[u]; but when it was for an ordinary perſon, or near relation, it laſted but about a week (R). In public mournings, the people were wont to Mourning.

get

[r] 2 Sam. i. 11, 12. xii. 16. xiii. 31, & ſeq. Ezek. xxiv. 16, 17. [f] Levit. xix. 28. Deut. xiv. 1. Vide FAG. in loc. [t] 2 Sam. i. 17, & ſeq. [u] Num. xx. ult. Deut. xxxiv. 8.

(R) The Talmudiſts, however, have abated much of theſe ſeverities, as being too often attended with great inconveniencies (74);

(74) Tract. בבא בתרה, Maim. Tract. אבל, c. 4.

for

get up to the tops of their houſes, there to give the greater vent to their grief; at leaſt it ſeems probable, that there was ſome ſuch cuſtom by what the prophet ſays, ſpeaking to Jeruſalem, what aileth thee now, that thou art gone up wholly to the houſe-tops, and ſo on [w]: and ſpeaking elſewhere of the Moabites, he ſays [x], on the tops of their houſes, and in their ſtreets, every one ſhall howl, weeping abundantly.

Funerals. THEIR funeral ceremonies were no leſs mournful. As ſoon as a perſon was dead, all the near relations came to the houſe in their mourning habit, and ſat down upon the ground, with a mournful ſilence, whilſt another part of the houſe echoed with the voices of mourners, and the ſounds of inſtruments ſuitable to the occaſion, and hired for the purpoſe [y] (S). Theſe laſted till the funeral was over, when the neareſt relations refor which reaſon they allow the mourners their full ſwing of crying and all other expreſſions of the deepeſt ſorrow; but expect, that it ſhould abate every day after, eſpecially if it is to laſt a whole month, which Joſephus thinks, is as long as a wiſe man would deſire to mourn for the loſs of the neareſt relation, or of the deareſt friend (75).

[w] Iſai. xxii. 1. [x] Ibid. xv. 3. [y] Jerem. ix. 17.

And here we cannot but take notice of an obſervation of a celebrated author, that the Iſraelites, and other antient nations, were more plain and undiſguiſed than we. Their joy, ſays he, was accompanied with ſongs and dances, and their grief with loud complaints: their fear expreſſed itſelf with cries, and their anger with ill language (76). The remark in fact is certainly juſt, and, with reſpect to the Iſraelites, very charitable; and an excellent pattern for thoſe of his church to copy after.

(S) As to the muſical inſtruments, we have no inſtance of their being uſed upon theſe occaſions in the old teſtament; only we find it practiſed in our Saviour's time (77); and the Talmudiſts aſſure us, that it was not only an antient cuſtom, but that it was even obligatory, and that the pooreſt huſband could have no leſs than two of them for his wife (78). Theſe inſtruments, according to them, were a kind of mournful flute; hence that proverb of theirs, flutes ſerve either for a bride or for the dead (79). As for the hired ſingers, their office was to ſing ſome mournful ditty, proper to fill the company with the deepeſt ſorrow. One of them is elegantly compriſed in few words by one of their rabbies, Mourn for the mourners, and not for the dead, for he is at reſt, and we in tears (80).

(75) Ant. lib. iv. c. 8. (76) Fleury Mœurs des Iſraelit. c. 18. (77) Matt. ix. 23. (78) Miſhn. Tr. כתובות, c. 4. Gemar. Babyl. in eund. titul. (79) Tract. בבא מציעא, c. 6. (80) Ear. Rabbin. ap. Hott. in Goodw. lib. vi. c. 5. note 12.

ſumed

ſumed their melancholy poſture, and continued in it all the time of the mourning, eating, ſitting, and lying upon the ground, and never ſpeaking to any, unleſs ſpoken to. Their very food was unclean and defiled by thoſe that eat of it[z]. They neither made their beds, waſhed themſelves, or pared their nails. In a word, they abſtained from every thing that could yield them any delight. They made indeed a kind of banquet for the reſt of the mourners, called by the prophets, the bread of men, and wine, or cup of conſolation[a]; but even then their tables were only covered with wooden, or common earthen platters and trenchers; and for the ſame reaſon they were not allowed to drink above ten glaſſes of wine at it, namely, three before, three at meat, and four after it, leſt any ſhould get drunk, and betray any token of mirth[b].

IN the mean time, there were proper perſons appointed to make ready the corpſe for the burial. It was looked upon as a duty incumbent on the neareſt relation preſent to cloſe the eyes of the deceaſed. This cuſtom is taken from God's promiſe to Jacob, that his ſon Joſeph ſhould perform that office to him[c]. If the perſon was of a conſiderable rank, they embalmed him, if otherwiſe, they contented themſelves with waſhing him (T). Sometimes they added a mixture of ſweet drugs and ſpices; in which they either wrapped the body, or which they burnt about it. This laſt is what we find was done at the funeral of Aſa, king of Judah, whoſe corpſe the text ſays, was laid upon a ſtately bed, which he had cauſed to be filled with coſtly perfumes made with great art, and with which they made a very great burning for him [d] (V). Neither was this ceremony peculiar to that prince, but common to the kings of Judah, and as such promised by the prophet to Zedekiah [e], and refused unto Jehoram [f]. How they dressed the corpse, or how they conveyed it to the grave, we dare not affirm, the law having ordained nothing concerning these, or any other circumstances relating to funerals; it is probable that custom and the circumstances of persons made them more or less sumptuous (W). The accompanying of the corpse to the burying place was rather an office of civility than obligation, and yet not only relations, neighbours, and acquaintance assisted at it, but even those who met the procession thought it incumbent upon them to join with the company; only the priests were not to be present at it, unless it were a very near relation, as we have seen elsewhere. The funeral of Abner, one of David's generals [g], doth give us an idea of the remainder of the ceremony. The king's servants,

[z] Vide Hoſea ix. 4. [a] Ezek. xxiv. 17. Jerem. xvi. 7. [b] In Tract. Abel. c. 4. [c] Gen. xlvi. 4.

(T) This ceremony of waſhing, was at leaſt practiſed in our Saviour's time (81); but how long before, is not eaſy to gueſs. The Jews indeed think it both antient and neceſſary, and add, that it was no ſooner performed, but they immediately ſtopped the main emunctories of the body, that no defilement might iſſue forth (82). As to what is added above, about wrapping the body in ſpices, it is inferred from what is ſaid of Joſeph that — ויחנטוהו, Vajicanthubu (83), the verb חנט, ſignifying according to the Talmudiſts, to anoint with a mixture made up of ſpices and other ſweet drugs. This we find was done to our Saviour (84), and Maimon mentions it as a conſtant practice uſed among the Jews (85).

(81) Act. ix. 37. (82) Maim. in Tract. אבל, c. 4. (83) Gen. l. ver. ult. (84) John xix. 40. (85) Ubi ſup.

[d] 2 Chron. xvi. ult. [e] Jerem. xxxiv. 5. [f] 2 Chron. xxi. 19. [g] 2 Sam. iii. 31, & seq.

(V) From these places, and another still more obscure in Amos, some have taken up a notion, that burning of the dead had been adopted by the Jews (86). But neither the texts above quoted, nor any instance we can meet with in their history doth countenance such an opinion, which all the Jewish doctors do disown; affirming, that nothing was burned at those funeral obsequies, but those sweet perfumes abovementioned. We may add, that Josiah's burning the bones of the priests of Baalim upon their idolatrous altars (87) implies, at least, a kind of abhorrence against such a practice, unless when it was done by way of punishment. Only R. Salomon adds, that they burned over those royal bodies טחן וכלי, חשמישן their beds, and other supellectilia veneris, sive quicquid veneri inservierat (88).

(W) The gospel doth indeed give us some account of the manner of burying at that time, both by what we read concerning that of Lazarus, of the widow's son at Nain, and also by the ceremonies which were performed at that of our Saviour; but we cannot thence infer, that they are the same that were used before the captivity. Maimon tells us, that the richest persons, even princes, were allowed but one Zux, or winding sheet, lest it should cast a shame on the poorer sort, who could afford no more. Neither was it allowed to be made of rich, or embroidered stuffs, because such pride did more become infidels, than the people of God He adds, that they also covered the face of the dead, that it might not be discovered, when any died through poverty and want 89).

(86) Ch. vi. 10. (87) 2 Chron. xxxiv 5. (88) Vide Munst. in Jerem. xxxiv. sub. note a. (89) Ubi sup.

with

with Joab at their head, were commanded to march before the corpſe in deep mourning, with their cloaths rent, and girded with ſackcloth, whilſt himſelf followed the bier to Hebron, Abner's burying place. As ſoon as they were come to it, the king himſelf made a funeral oration in his praiſe, which was accompanied with the mournful voices of all the company, whilſt they were depoſiting the body into the grave. It appears moreover, that the day could not be far ſpent when they buried that great general, becauſe, when, upon their return home, David was entreated by his ſervants to take ſome refreſhment, he anſwered with an oath, that he would neither eat nor drink, till the ſun was down [h] (X).

Sepulchres.

THEY had ſuch an extreme abhorrence againſt having their own, or their friends bodies expoſed after death, that they denied ſepulture to none, but ſuch as were guilty of ſelf-murder, and not even to theſe, but till after ſun-ſet. They had burying places for ſtrangers, and for ſuch who were put to death for capital crimes. The provident care of the patriarchs to make ſure of a ſepulchre for their poſterity, and ſeveral expreſs threatnings in the ſacred writings, made them eſteem it as a ſevere curſe from God, to be deprived of burial [i], and a bleſſing to be interred among their anceſtors. For this reaſon, thoſe who had inherited a burying place were extremely careful of preſerving it to their poſterity; and thoſe who had not, were no leſs ſolicitous to provide one for themſelves and their families: and as the law had ordained nothing concerning them, ſo they thought it indifferent where they had them, whether in a garden, an orchard, a field, a mountain, or in a rock, ſo they could but ſecure the poſſeſſion of it. We do not read indeed of any epitaphs or monumental inſcriptions being uſed among them, yet we may reaſonably

[h] Ibid. ver. 35. [i] Vide Jerem. viii. 2. xxii. 19. Eccleſ. vi. 3, & alib.

(X) It appears from the examples of Tobit and of the Maccabees, that they uſed moreover to lay ſome kind of victuals over the ſepulchres of the dead, that the poor might receive the benefit of them, and pray for the ſoul of the deceaſed, for whom they uſed alſo to offer ſacrifices, that they might be abſolved from their ſins, and be at peace (90). But theſe, eſpecially the laſt, ſeem rather to have been works of ſupererogation, being no where commanded or countenanced by any thing we meet with in the canonical books, and in all likelihood, never practiſed till after the captivity.

(90) Vide Tobit. iv. 17. vide & Eccleſ. xxx. 18. 2 Maccab. xii. 43, & ſeq.

ſuppoſe, that every family, at leaſt, ſet ſome particular mark upon their burying place: they were even under an obligation to diſtinguiſh them from other places, by ſome peculiar mark; that people might not be defiled by going over them. But there was ſomething ſtill more particular to diſtinguiſh the graves of eminent perſons, as we may infer from the inſtance of the man of God, who had foretold the deſtruction of the altar of Bethel, and whoſe grave was known by ſome inſcription or mark above 300 years after, when Joſiah was fulfilling his prediction [k]. The ſepulchres of the kings of Judah were in that part of Jeruſalem where the temple ſtood [l]. Ezekiel ſeems to hint, that they were cut in the rock under it, when he ſays, that the Lord's holy hill ſhould be no more defiled by the carcaſes of their kings [m]. All his deſcendants are ſaid to have been buried in the ſame place, except Manaſſeh, who was buried in the garden of Uzza, adjoining to his own houſe [n]. Whether the ſepulchre of David was built, or only begun by him, and finiſhed by Solomon, or any of his ſucceſſors, is not certain: but it is ſtill to be ſeen at this day, without the walls of the preſent Jeruſalem, though ſome think it more likely, that it ſtood at firſt within the walls of the old. It is a moſt ſtately piece of work, and perhaps the only genuine monument of that antient city. We have given a deſcription of that ſurpriſing fabric in another ſection †, to which we have nothing to add on that head.

A late modern Jewiſh traveller [o] has added ſeveral other particulars relating to this royal tomb, but which we dare not inſert, nor give credit to. However, it was in this place, that Joſephus tells us [p], Solomon did lay up an immenſe treaſure, which was not diſcovered, or at leaſt broke in upon, till thirteen hundred years after, when the city being ſtraightly beſieged by Antiochus, Hircan the high-prieſt had recourſe to the tomb, and drew three thouſand talents out, and bought off his enemy with a good part of it. He adds, that Herod did likewiſe find a way into another hidden cell, out of which he got a prodigious treaſure, but that neither he nor any one elſe could ever diſcover the bones of David, his tomb being ſo artfully contrived, and ſo deep in the ground, as to elude the moſt curious ſearch. Something like this Mr. Jay has given us in his polyglot, out of an antient Arabic manuſcript, but whether either of theſe had the account from any authentic records, or from a bare tradition they do not tell us. The [k] Comp. 1 King. xiii. 1, & ſeq. & 2 King. xxiii. 17. [l] 1 King. ii. 10. xi. 43, & alib. paſſ. [m] Ch. xliii. 7, 9. [n] 2 King. xxi. 18, 26. † See before, p. 139. [o] BENJ. TUDEL, & al. [p] Ant. lib. vii. c. 12.

burying

burying places of the kings of Iſrael, after Jeroboam's revolt, were in Samaria; but we cannot ſuppoſe them to have equalled thoſe of Judah, both becauſe they were inferior to them in riches, and becauſe the crown never ſtayed in one family above three or four generations. Thoſe of private families were in all likelihood more or leſs ſumptuous, according to their quality and opulence; they were however curious to have them, if poſſible, cut into the rock, which was nc difficult matter in ſuch a rocky and mountainous country. They were to be, according to the rules laid down in the Talmud[q], which probably took them from the form of the antient ſepulchres that were built before the captivity, ſix cubits long, four in breadth, and ſeven in height. Round theſe there were likewiſe to be little nitches or cells for the repoſiting of the dead bodies, to the number of eight according tc ſome, or thirteen according to others. The mouth of it was covered with a large ſtone, which they called Gallal, from the rolling it upon the cave. This ſtone, if there were no other ornaments over the grave, was to be often whited, that paſſengers might ſee it at a diſtance, and the ſame was done at leaſt to thoſe monuments which were erected for conſiderable perſons. How they beautified them in our Saviour's time, his comparing the hypocritical Phariſees to them[r] ſufficiently ſhews; and if thoſe that are ſtill extant under the names of the tombs of Abraham, Rachel, Abſalom, Eliſha, and others, be really theirs, which is much to be queſtioned, it muſt have required no ſmall pains and coſt to keep them ſo long in repair (Y).

FROM

[q] Tract. Bava Batra, c. vi. 2. Vide Gloſſ. BARTEN. ad Tract. Mohed. Katon. c. i. [r] Matt. xxiii. 27.

(Y) The Jews called theſe burying places the houſes of the living. The Talmudiſts pretend, that Jeruſalem had this peculiar privilege above other cities, that it had but two tombs, namely that of David, and that of the propheteſs Huldah, which they pretend had been built by the old prophets; and that when a corpſe was to be tranſported from one place to another, it was not lawful to go through the city, tho' it was in their way, leſt it ſhould be defiled by it (91). We find a ſtrange opinion among the Jews, how old it is we cannot affirm, that thoſe who die out of the land of Canaan ſhall be excluded the reſurrection, unleſs God be pleaſed to afford them a ſubterranean way, by which their ſouls, after a long tumbling, or volving about, may at length happily reach it. This notion

(91) Vide Baſnag. R. H. lib. i. c. 7.

FROM theſe houſes of the dead, we gladly paſs to thoſe of the living; and here we obſerve in the firſt place, that they were plain, low, and flat, ſuitable to the climate, with rails round the tops, to keep people from falling. Their furniture was much after the ſame ſtyle; chimnies, ſaſhes, and caſements were needleſs, where they were forced to ſtudy coolneſs and freſhneſs, for the ſame reaſon tapeſtry was of no uſe but upon the floor, to ſit, eat, or ſleep upon; and if they uſed any bedcurtains, they were made of ſome fine gauz, to keep off gnats and other inſects, whence comes the name of canopy. Their beds ſeem to have been at ſome conſiderable height from the ground, from their common phraſe of climbing up to them †‡†. The prophet Amos, c. vi. 4. doth upbraid the effeminate with lying upon beds of Ivory, and upon their ſoft couches; and the harlot in the Proverbs, vii: 16. ſpeaks of the fine furniture and perfumes with which ſhe has decked her own; and no doubt, a great deal of luxury had been introduced by Solomon's wives, and was imitated by the ſofter; but it is plain, that lying hard muſt have been more ſuitable to the heat of the country, as well as the ſimplicity of their forefathers, and upon both accounts preferred by the wiſer ſort. If we might gueſs of the reſt of their furniture by that which the Shunammite put into the prophet's chamber, we muſt ſuppoſe, that they did not value themſelves upon the notion is partly owing to that extreme ſolicitude, which the old patriarchs, eſpecially Jacob and Joſeph, ſhewed, to have their bodies buried there, and partly to an exceſſive fondneſs themſelves have for the land, not only upon account of its fancied holineſs and excellence above all others, but more particularly, becauſe they think, that it will prove the ſcene of the reſurrection. This laſt they infer from a miſtaken place in Ezekiel (92), which, if rightly underſtood, rather implies, that God would raiſe his people out of their graves, and bring them from the lands in which they died, into their own land, (that of Canaan); as one of their own rabbies has plainly ſhewn againſt them (93). However, this is one of the three reaſons which the others give for Joſeph's exacting an oath of his brethren to carry his body into Canaan. The ſecond is, that he foreſaw that the duſt of Egypt would be turned into lice, which would have been a diſcredit to his aſhes; and the third, leſt the too great veneration of the Egyptians for his memory, ſhould inſenſibly have drawn them into the worſhip of his relics (94).

†‡† Pſ. cxxxii. 3. 2 King. i. 16.

(92) Ezek. xxxvii. 11, 12. (93) Kimchi in loc. (94) Vide R Sal. Jarc. in Gen. l. 25.

richneſs

richneſs or ſuperfluity of it. And we may here obſerve in general, that there is more frequent mention made in the ſacred books of veſſels of wood and earth, than of thoſe of more coſtly ſtuff.

FROM this prophet's chamber and furniture, we beg leave to make two remarks; the firſt is, that bed chambers were raiſed at ſome diſtance from the ground, becauſe they are called by a name that implies an aſcent, and might be as properly rendered an upper room. Perhaps the reaſon of their being thus raiſed was, to avoid the dampneſs of the earth, which may be reaſonably ſuppoſed greater and more dangerous, eſpecially to thoſe who did lie upon the ground within, than without doors. The other is, that tho' they did not turn ſo much of the night into day as we do, yet they made uſe of artificial light, which was that of an oil lamp, and this had more or fewer branches, according to the work that was done by it. Thus Solomon's houſe-wife is repreſented in the Proverbs, riſing whilſt it is yet dark, and diſtributing her work among her ſervants; where there is alſo a beautiful deſcription of a well regulated family. As to the largeneſs of their houſes, and number of their apartments, we may ſuppoſe them to be anſwerable to the richneſs and numerouſneſs of the family. The women had their ſeparate apartments, both for privacy, in which they were like other eaſtern nations, and for legal infirmities, which ſecluded them from the reſt of the family for a time; during which none muſt make uſe of their beds, chairs, tables, or any other part of their furniture or utenſils. All the females of a houſe were obliged to be exceedingly careful in this particular, from which the pooreſt ſort were not exempted, tho' it could not fail of putting ſuch to great inconvenience. Upon this account, as well as ſome others, they were likewiſe forced to have places for bathing in every houſe. Their laborious life, the heat, and dryneſs of the country made waſhing likewiſe neceſſary, and as it is apt to dry the ſkin too much, they uſed to anoint themſelves, either with oil, or with ſome other ointments, more or leſs coſtly according to their circumſtances, but generally perfumed.

Their arts and trades.

THE arts in which the Iſraelites did chiefly diſtinguiſh themſelves were thoſe of war, huſbandry, poetry, and muſic. The firſt of theſe was in a manner natural to them. We ſhall not venture to ſay how much they, eſpecially Moſes their leader, had learned of it in Egypt; but whoever obſerves the regular order of their encampments, intrenching, fighting, retiring, and ſuch like, of which we have had occaſion to War.

ſpeak

ſpeak in another place †, muſt allow him to have been as experienced a general as any of his time; and his people as well trained up in it as any of their neighbours. We need not to remind our reader here, in how ſhort a time, not above ſix years, they conquered the greateſt part of Canaan, in ſpight of all the natural and artificial ſtrength of that country, and the united oppoſition of its warlike inhabitants. Neither was it poſſible for them to forget it at any time afterwards, becauſe they were continually engaged in ſome war or other with their neighbours, from the days of Joſhua to the reign of Solomon; inſomuch, that it is recorded in one place as a kind of wonder, that the land had reſt forty years [r]. A late author [s] has moreover been at the pains to prove the antient Jews to have been a warlike nation, not only from the many inſtances of their proweſs mentioned in holy writ, but likewiſe from the great number of warlike terms which he has collected out of thoſe books, which manifeſtly ſhew them to have been very well verſed in the military art. We ſhall refer our readers to the author himſelf for thoſe curious remarks, and only obſerve here, that the writers from whom he took them were neither given to flattery, or partial fondneſs for their own nation, but related theſe facts with the candor and ſimplicity which became inſpired penmen. As to their generals, whether judges or princes, or officers who acted under them, their warlike deeds will be mentioned in their proper place, in the ſequel of this hiſtory; and as to the people, tho' their courage was not always proof, but wanted often to be ſupported by art, yet we may ſay, that their men were all trained up to war, at leaſt till David's reign, for we do not read of any regular troops till that time. Till then, as ſoon as their rulers had reſolved upon a war, whether offenſive or defenſive, the ſummons were ſent to every tribe, upon which, all that were fit to bear arms were obliged to repair to the place of rendezvous, with their arms and proviſion for a month; and there a certain number was drawn out according to the preſent exigence, and the reſt ſent back to their own home, and as ſoon as they had atchieved what they went upon, they returned every one to his own home [u]. This did happen very often on the very day on which they ſet out; the country being ſmall, and their enemies at their elbow, it was a common thing for them to ſally out, engage the enemy, beat or be beaten, and be at home on the ſame, or at

† See before, p. 46. & ſeq. [r] Judg. v. ult. [s] FOLARD, Diſſert. ſur la Tactique des Hebreux. [u] 1 Sam. xi. paſſ. xiii. 2, & alib.

moſt

moſt on the next, night. It was eaſy for their army to be ſubſiſted, when their greateſt marches did not exceed two or three days journey: the whole people of Iſrael may therefore be looked upon as a body of militia trained up in war, and in time of peace inured to a laborious life, that of agriculture. Their generals, from Joſhua to Saul, were either appointed over them by God, as Othniel, Gideon, Samſon [w] and others, or choſen by the people, as Jephthah [x], or by treachery and cruelty, as Abimelech [y]. Theſe however, eſpecially the two laſt, were not univerſally obeyed, but by thoſe only who had choſen them, which occaſioned ſuch commotions amongſt them, that they found themſelves under a neceſſity of having a king to prevent all further diſputes, and to be ready upon all occaſions againſt their enemies.

THEIR arms were, like thoſe of other antient nations, either offenſive or defenſive; the former were ſwords, ſpears, javelins, bows and arrows, and ſlings. Their ſwords were ſhort, crooked, broad, and ſharp, which they girded upon their thigh [z]; we read alſo of two-edged ſwords [a]; as for their javelins, they ſeem rather to have been a kind of ſhort pikes, ſuch as that which Saul threw at David [b]. They were likewiſe very expert at ſlinging of ſtones, witneſs David's killing of Goliath, and the inhabitants of Gibeath, who are recorded to have hit within a hair's breadth [c]. The expreſſion often uſed, gird every man his ſword, and even by David in his fugitive ſtate [d], when he was expoſed to continual dangers, ſhews the cuſtom of wearing ſwords, at any time but that of action, not to have been known, even to the Jewiſh warriors. Saul is the only perſon who is obſerved to have had his javelin or ſpear always about him [e], and this perhaps not till his ſuſpicion and rage againſt David made him think himſelf unſafe without it. Their defenſive arms were, the helmet, ſhield, breaſt-plate, coat of mail, and target: ſome wore even greaves, to ſave their legs. We find a deſcription of a complete armour in that of Goliath [f]; but it is probable, that all theſe were more common among their neighbours than among the Iſraelites, at leaſt before David's reign; for we find, that in Deborah's time there were found neither ſhield nor ſpear among the forty thouſand that fought againſt Siſera [g]; and that when David came to be dreſſed Arms.

[w] Judg. iii, vi, & xv, paſſ. [x] Ibid. xi. 6, & ſeq. [y] Ibid. ix, paſſ. [z] Vide Exod. xxxii. 27. Pſ. xlv. 3. Jud. iii. 16. [a] Pſ. cxlix. 6. [b] 1 Sam. xviii. 11. [c] Judg. xx. 16. [d] 1 Sam. xxv. 13. [e] Ibid. xix. 9. xxvi. 7. [f] 1 Sam. xvii. 5, & ſeq. [g] Judg. v. 8.

cap-a-pee in Saul's armour, he was so little used to that kind of incumbrance, that he could not stir in it, and was forced to pull it off [h]. This might probably be owing to the policy of their neighbours, by whom they were often conquered, and not only stripped of all their old weapons, but likewise hindered from making new ones; insomuch, that the text tells us, that on the day of battle there was neither sword nor spear found among Saul's army, except those which himself and his son Jonathan had [i]. This indeed is very surprising, considering that the preceding chapter mentions one signal victory, which that new monarch had got over the Ammonites, in which they might have furnished themselves with the arms of the slain, and of those that ran away; to say nothing of the impossibility of their cutting that army in pieces from morning till noon, unless they had had a considerable quantity of their own: so that unless we suppose, that there is an accidental transposition of the chapters and facts, or that the words must not be understood to mean more, than that there was a greater scarcity of them than the army would require, we shall be at a loss to guess, how the Philistines could, in so short a time, strip them of all their arms. But however that be, it is certain, that they became more common, after they had recovered their liberty under David and Solomon; and in process of time Uzziah is said to have provided a sufficient quantity of all these kinds, to furnish his army with, tho' it consisted of upwards of three hundred thousand men [k]. These arms were commonly made of brass, sometimes also of iron, steel, and other materials [l] (Z).

Job

[h] 1 Sam. xvii. 38, & seq.
[i] Vide Ibid. xiii. 19, & seq.
[k] 2 Chron. xxvi. 13, 14.
[l] Vide CALM. Dissert. sur la Milic. des Hebr.

(Z) Some interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, think that the coat of mail which Saul died in, was made of some kind of linen, so woven as to be impenetrable (95). They render the words, which the young Amalekite makes Saul to say, I am entangled in this coat of linen (96) instead of anguish or terror is come upon me, as ours and other versions have it. The truth is, the word שבץ, Shebetz, here in question, doth properly signify a sling, or a kind of net-work, such as we shewed the curtains of the court of the tabernacle to have been made of †, and the same word is used by the psalmist, when he speaks of the queen's vesture (97). Our

(95) Rabb. Levi, Munst. & al. in 2 Sam. i. 9. Calm. sub voc. Arms. Buxtorf., sub voc. שבץ. (96) 2 Sam. ibid † See before p. 283. (97) Ps. xlv. 10.

version

Job ſpeaks of weapons of iron and bows of braſs [m], and this laſt is likewiſe mentioned by the pſalmiſt [n], though our verſion tranſlates it bows of ſteel in both places, the original being capable of both meanings. We read likewiſe of ſhields of gold and of braſs, but theſe can only be ſuppoſed to have been plated over with it, and that they were underneath of ſome light ſort of wood, elſe they muſt have been rather a burden than a help to thoſe that wore them. From the prophet's expreſſion of anointing the ſhield [o], ſome authors have thought, that they had got the art of covering them with leather or raw hides [p], but thoſe that were covered with braſs might want oiling, as much to keep them bright, as thoſe of leather, if any ſuch there were, to preſerve them from cracking. Upon the whole, their fighting being rather a kind of ſkirmiſhing, than cloſe and regular engagements, we find, that they chiefly aimed at excelling in the uſe of thoſe weapons which hurt at a diſtance, ſuch as were the bow, the ſling, and the javelin.

THE heat, narrowneſs, and mountainouſneſs of their country rendered cavalry altogether needleſs and uſeleſs, for which reaſon they never incumbered themſelves with any, that being only neceſſary in cold and ſpacious countries, where marches are long, and the ways leſs difficult. Abſalom was the firſt we read of, that made uſe of them in his revolt againſt David [q], but his ill ſucceſs and loſs of the bat-

[m] Job. xx. 24. [n] Pſ. xviii. 34. [o] Iſai. xxi. 5. [p] CALM. & FOLARD, ubi ſup. [q] 2 Sam. xv. 1.

verſion renders it barely, of wrought gold; but might be more properly rendered veſte ocellata, a garment full of eyelet-holes: if there had therefore been any truth in what the Amalekite told David, the words אחזני שבץ, Achazani ſhebetz, would be more properly rendered, I am intangled, but it might be ſtill as well underſtood by his enemies, as by his armour. However, there appears nothing like ſuch an impenetrable coat, ſince in fact Saul, having in vain deſired his armour-bearer to run him through with his ſword, did put an end to his life by falling upon his own (98).

We may obſerve here alſo, that the original has no leſs than four different names for what ours, and other verſions render a ſhield, namely מגן, Magen, צנה, Zinnah, סוחרה, Socherah, and כדון, Kiddon, but whether they all ſignified the ſame kind of defenſive weapon, and only diſtinguiſhed their various ſhapes and the materials they were made of, or otherwiſe, we dare not ſay.

(98) 1 Sam. xxxi. 4.

tle ſhew, that they were of no other ſervice to him, than to facilitate his flight [r]. Solomon did indeed ſend for a conſiderable number of horſes from Egypt, with a proportionable number of chariots [s]; but ſome think, that he did it rather for grandeur than uſe; and indeed the expence did ſo far outweigh their ſervice, that his ſucceſſors contented themſelves with hiring them of the Egyptians, upon any exigence; inſomuch, that Rab-ſhakeh made their want of them a pretence for taunting king Hezekiah, that if he ſhould lend him two thouſand horſes, none of his ſubjects were capable of riding them [t]. From all which it appears, that the Iſraelites did not much regard either chariots or horſes. And yet, as to the former, it is certain, they had not only ſeen them in Egypt, where they were in great plenty; but that the Canaanites, againſt whom they were at continual wars, brought an almoſt incredible quantity of them to the field. Siſera we read had nine hundred of them in his army [u]; but what is ſtill more ſurpriſing is, that thoſe which the Philiſtines made uſe of againſt Saul are ſaid to have amounted to about thirty thouſand [w]: a prodigious number indeed, if there is not crept ſome error into the text; and ſuch as one would ſcarce think their ſcanty country would have been large enough to turn them in. They were indeed ſmall, being juſt fit to contain one or two men at moſt; ſome of them had four, and others but two wheels, and they were generally drawn by two horſes [x]. The text calls them chariots of iron, becauſe their poles, wheels, and axles, &c. were armed with ſharp ſcythes. We are told, that they hindered, at firſt, the tribe of Judah from conquering thoſe cities that were in the plains [y]. becauſe they do moſt execution there. Beſides the terror they were apt to inject in the enemy, by being placed along the front of the line of battle, they never failed of breaking the ranks, and ſometimes of putting the adverſary to a total rout; ſo that there was no way of preventing it, but by either ſtopping their career, by killing the horſes before their too near approach, or, if that failed, by opening a paſſage through them. It is likely, the Iſraelites were very well ſkilled in both, ſeeing they ſo often engaged them, and ſtill came off with victory, without oppoſing the ſame kind of deſtructive engines.

[r] Ibid. xviii. 6, & ſeq. [s] 1 King. x. 26, & ſeq. 2 Chron. i. 14. [t] 2 Kings xviii. 23. [u] Judg. iv. 3, 13. [w] 1 Sam. xiii. 5. [x] Vide STEWCH. in Veget. de Re Militar. [y] Judg. i. 19.

WE hinted before, that they kept no regular forces before Saul's time; and he is mentioned to have had but few ſtanding troops, ſcarce a handful in compariſon of that prodigious number which David did raiſe them up to, namely, to above two hundred and eighty thouſand (A), beſides the Cherethites and Pelethites, which were ſtrangers, and kept alſo in pay by him [z]. All theſe were not only continued on foot by his ſon Solomon, but an addition was made to thoſe forces, of a prodigious number of horſes and chariots; inſomuch that he is recorded to have had forty thouſand ſtalls for his chariot horſes, beſides twelve thouſand horſes for his cavalry, or life-guard [a], and fourteen hundred chariots of war [b]: It is certain alſo, that the hiſtory of his ſucceſſors doth frequently mention ſuch numerous armies as would ſcarce be credited in a prophane author. Such were thoſe of Abijah, king of Judah, and of Jeroboam, the new king of Iſrael; the former of which conſiſted of four hundred thouſand men, and the latter of double that number, and of which five hundred thouſand were killed on the ſpot by the army of Judah [d]. Such was alſo that of his ſon Aſa, which conſiſted of almoſt ſix hundred thouſand, with which he diſcomfited that of Zerah, king of Æthiopia, which conſiſted of a million of men [e]. But the greateſt ſtanding army of any of the Jewiſh kings, that we read of, was that of Jehoſhaphat, which is ſaid to have amounted to eleven hundred and ſixty thouſand, all men of valour, and prepared for the war, beſides thoſe which he kept in his gariſons throughout the kingdom [f]. To theſe we may add, that Uzziah introduced in Jeruſalem a new invention of engines, which being ſet upon the walls and towers of it, did caſt arrows, and other offenſive weapons, and great ſtones to a conſiderable diſtance [g]. Standing army.

WE find nothing in the ſacred books that can give us an idea of their forming ſuch numerous bodies into order of battle; yet if we may make a judgment from ſome ſcripture phraſes, ſuch as joining in battle, ſetting the battle in array, Art of war

[z] 1 Chron. xviii. ver. ult. xxvii. 1, & ſeq. [a] 1 King. iv. 26. x. 26. [b] Ibid. x. 26. [c] 2 Chron. xiii. 3. [d] Ibid. ver 17. [e] Ibid. xiv. 8, & ſeq. [f] Ibid. xvii. 14, & ſeq. [g] Ibid. xxvi. 15.

(A) The book of the Chronicles tells us, that he had 24,000, which came regularly upon duty every month throughout the year, under their reſpective officers (99), which being therefore multiplied by 12, amounts to 288,000.

(99) 1 Chron. xxvii. 1, & ſeq.

engaging

engaging army against army, and the like; or from their exact and regular division; 1. Into twelve main bodies, according to their tribes; 2. Each of these into thousands, or regiments; 3. Into hundreds, or companies; 4. Into tens, and even into threes, every one having a proper officer set over them; but above all, from their admirable method of marching and incamping, mentioned elsewhere †, we may venture to affirm, that they observed no less regularity in their disposition of the order of battle, in their onsets, fighting, evolutions, retiring, and other military motions. If we may believe the Jewish authors, they ranged their army into one single line of a considerable depth, sometimes between twenty and thirty deep. In the front of these, they placed their light-armed men, that is, their most expert archers, spearmen, and slingers, who began the onset with a warlike shout, and with sending thick showers of arrows and stones upon their enemies front, in order to inject terror and confusion, and to stop the rushing in of their chariots upon them, by wounding both the horse and the driver. This is indeed probable enough, seeing that method was common to all the Asiatic nations. We read, that David entertained a considerable number of these troops, who are said to have been ambidexter, exceeding fierce of aspect, and swift of foot [h]. But what they add seems more peculiar to their nation, namely, that they placed behind the ranks some of the stoutest subalterns, armed with scythes and axes, to cut in pieces those that offered to give ground. We are still to seek how they disposed of their cavalry, after it became in use among them: probably after the manner of the Egyptians, from whom they had it; that is in large squadrons of six or eight hundred horse, placed on the two wings [i]. One thing is certain, that, whether they had any of their own or not, they never dreaded it in an enemy; but endeavoured at once to open themselves a swift passage through it, as the surest way to gain the victory: and this is the reason why we find them so seldom discomfited, and so often victorious over their enemies, though superior to them in this and many other respects.

THE method of attacking the enemy in separate bodies was as antient, we find, as Abraham, who divided his little army of 318 domestics, and discomfited that of the four confederate kings [k]. It was afterwards followed by Abimelech against the Shechemites [l], and by Saul against the Ammonites at Jabesh Gilead [m], with good success. We shall pass by some

† See before, p. 54, & seq.

[h] 1 Chron. xii. 1, & seq. [i] Vide FOLARD, ubi sup. [k] Gen. xiv. 13, & seq. [l] Judg. ix. 34. [m] 1 Sam. xi. 11.

ſome other warlike cuſtoms which they had in common with other nations, ſuch as the uſe of the trumpets in their marches and engagements, their uſual harangues before they entered into action, and ſome others, which have been hinted at already under ſome former heads.

Wars.

THEIR wars were of two kinds, either ſuch as God had obliged them to, as thoſe againſt the Amalekites, and the ſeven nations of Canaan, or ſuch as they undertook by their chiefs and princes, upon any other occaſion, whether offenſive or defenſive. The Moſaic law had left theſe to their diſcretion; ſo that they were at liberty to engage in them upon any juſt grounds. We have already taken notice of their manner of entering upon an offenſive war, by offering certain articles of peace, the refuſal of which was interpreted as a declaration of war [n]. When it was reſolved upon for the recovery of any loſt territories, they generally made a demand of them, and when they were attacked by enemies, they likewiſe ſent to expoſtulate with them *. However, this was not always the caſe, and a war was ſometimes reſolved upon, without any viſible ground, and the chartel ſent in theſe few words, Let us look one another in the face, and returned in terms equivalent [o]. The challenge of the king of Aſſyria to that of Judah was ſtill more haughty; Thy ſilver and thy gold, thy wives and children, and all thou haſt art mine [p]. The text obſerves in both caſes, that theſe proud meſſages proved fatal to the ſenders. It was the conſtant cuſtom of the Hebrew kings to command their armies in perſon, if they were able; and the people were ſo uſed to it, that when Ahab was mortally wounded by the Syrians, ſome of his ſervants were forced to ſtay him up in his chariot, to prevent his army being routed by the news of his death; and as ſoon as it was diſcovered by the bloodineſs of his chariot, there went immediately a proclamation through his hoſt, to diſmiſs every man to his city and country; though Jehoſhaphat king of Judah, his confederate in that war, did likewiſe command there in perſon [q]. In the beginning of the Jewiſh monarchy their kings uſed to fight on foot, as the judges had done before them; at leaſt we do not read of any horſes or chariots uſed by them till a long time after; and it is very probable, that they took their riſe from thoſe alliances which the kings both of Iſrael and Judah were often forced to make with the Egyptians, Syrians, and other nations, and which put them under a neceſſity of appearing

Alliances.

[n] Deut. xx. 10, & ſeq. See before, p. 17. note (P). * Judg. xi. 12. & ſeq. [o] 2 King. xiv. 8. [p] 1 King. xx. 2, & ſeq. [q] 1 King. xxii. 34, & ſeq.

Offices.

pearing at the head of their army, with a grandeur answerable to that of their allies. The officers of war under them were, 1. The head, or general of the army (B); 2. The princes, or generals of each tribe. 3. The commanders of thousands. 4. Of hundreds. 5. Of fifties. 6. Of tens. 7. Of threes. (C). 8. Their scribes, or muster-masters, who kept exact rolls of all that bore arms under their districts. 9. Lastly, Their Soterim, or inspectors, or, as others think, a kind of provosts or ministers to inflict punishments on all delinquents.

THE Mosaic law was certainly the best calculated to make a people happy, by making every man live by his labour, without luxury or ambition, and at once free from the danger of being totally ruined, and from the temptation of becoming excessively rich by those two vices, or from too great desire after change and novelty. Every man cultivated his own vine, field, orchard, and could indifferently handle the plough and flail, or the sword and bow, as occasion required, but preferred still a quiet life under his vine and fig-tree. This is what their law-giver inforced, not only by the example of the old patriarchs, but much more by the blessings which were promised to their obedience; these were to be neither gold, silver, nor precious stones, stately houses, or sumptuous furniture, but the former and latter rain, regular seasons, plenty of corn, wine, and oil, increase of cattle, multitude of children, with a quiet peaceful enjoyment of them, and victory over their enemies; all which, joined to the natural fertility of their soil, proved such powerful encouragements to agriculture, that there is scarce any known people that gave itself more entirely and universally to it than the Jews. Accordingly, from the most opulent families of the tribe of Judah, to the most indigent of that of Benjamin, from the oldest to the youngest, we find them either plowing, or sowing, or reaping, at the threshing-floor, or feeding their numerous herds (D); at least till

Agriculture.

Solomon

(B) This officer was called שר צבא, Sar tzaba, or prince of the host, such Abner was under Saul (100), Joab under David (1), and Benaiah under Solomon (2).

(C) These are called שלישים, Shalishim, and mentioned after the decurions, from which it is concluded, that they were inferior to them; but what their office was, is not easy to guess.

(D) Thus we find Gideon threshing when he received his commission, and Boaz at his harvest when Ruth came thither to glean.

(100) 2 Sam. ii. 8. (1) Ibid. xxiv. 2. (2) 1 King. ii. 35.

Saul

Solomon introduced commerce and luxury, and with it a multitude of manufactures and trades from other nations (E).

THUS then every one was bound to cultivate that portion of land which the lot had aſſigned to his anceſtors at its firſt diſtribution, and to maintain himſelf and family out of the product of it. It was his patrimony which he could not change for another, or alienate without injury to his children and diſgrace to himſelf. The judges, and the very kings, did both practice it themſelves, and encourage it in others; all the difference there was between them and private men, was that they had more lands and more numerous herds. Thus David, tho' he heaped up immenſe quantities of gold and ſilver, yet in the liſt of his riches, mention is made of his arable and paſture grounds, of his ſtore-houſes for corn, wine, and oil, of his plantations of fig, olive, and other fruit-trees, of his numerous herds of oxen, camels, ſheep, and aſſes [r]. His ſon Solomon not only multiplied them in proportion to the great conſumption which the vaſt number of his wives, concubines, and ſervants, required; but tells us, likewiſe, what

[r] 1 Chron. xxvii. 25, & ſeq.

Saul tho' anointed king, was at his plow when he received news of the diſtreſſed Gileadites, and David returned to feed his flocks after Samuel had anointed him king; and when he was come to the height of his grandeur, his ſons uſed to feaſt one another at their ſheep-ſhearing (3). We omit many more examples of the like nature, with which the ſacred hiſtory abounds.

(E) Whoever conſiders, how many curious manufactures, were employed in the fabricature of the tabernacle and all its ſumptuous utenſils, and that thoſe arts were rather ſubſervient to luxury than to the neceſſities of life, ſuch as were the caſting of metals, engraving and cutting of precious ſtones, weaving of tapeſtry, embroidery and many more, will be apt to conclude, that other more uſeful trades and manufactures were already in much greater perfection among the Iſraelites, and conſequently, that they could not chooſe but bring and cultivate them in the land of Canaan; but whether they, eſpecially their maſter artificers, had learned all thoſe fine arts in Egypt, or were miraculouſly endowed with them, as the text doth rather intimate, yet it doth not appear, that any of them were afterwards uſed among them till Solomon's time; and even he was forced to ſend for his artificers from abroad; probably, becauſe the Philiſtines in Saul's time had deprived them of their workmen in iron (4), without which few trades could be carried on.

(3) 2 Sam. xiii. 23, & ſeq. (4) 1 Sam. xiii. 29, & ſeq.

pains he took to outdo all that had gone before him, in the number and elegancy of them [r]; where it is to be observed, that his fine gardens and orchards were chiefly stored with, such fruit trees, plants, and herbs, as were more for use than shew. How he commends the diligence of the husbandman, and exposes the stupidity of the slothful, every chapter almost of his proverbs is a witness; however he came afterwards to depart from his own maxims, which were built upon the most solid reason and truest policy.

FOR whoever considers the small extent of Canaan, and the numerousness of its inhabitants, will be rather apt to wonder how it could be able to maintain such incredible multitudes, though cultivated with all the care and industry they were capable of (F), especially considering that it was to rest every seventh year; and yet it is plain, that it had more than sufficed them, seeing they exported great quantities of corn, oil, honey, and other provisions to the city of Tyre, both for the service of the king [t], and for the merchants who came thither for it from other parts [u]. Besides these, they had great quantities of rye, barley, and other grain, variety of herbs and roots, and especially of fruits fit for food; such were their olives, dates, figs, pomegranates, and many more. Their very vines, which were very numerous, and of whose extraordinary fertility the spies brought such a noble specimen [w], did afford them food as well as drink. For as wine was not drunk in such plenty as it has been since, their dried grapes were not only in great plenty, but were justly

[r] Eccles. ii. 5. & seq. [t] 1 Kings v. 11. [u] Ezek. xxvii. 17. [w] Num. xiii. 23, & seq.

(F) The reader may easily form a judgment of their numerousness, by the computation we made of those that came out of Egypt, whom we shewed to have amounted to near three millions †; and by that which David caused to be made a little before his death, the sum of which was thirteen hundred thousand fighting men, which being above double the number of those who came out of Egypt, we must consequently allow, with the same proportion of young and old men, wives, servants, and slaves, to have been at least six millions; a prodigious number seemingly to be all fed out of the product of so small a country, tho' far enough from impossible if we consider it, not as it is now, laid waste and depopulate by the Turk, but as it was at that time, fertile, populous, cultivated and improved *.

† See Vol. II. p. 463. & p. 534. note (P) * See before p. 122.

esteemed

eſteemed an excellent food. To all theſe we may add the multitude of cattle, which they not only bred themſelves, but which they had from other neighbouring countries. For we have ſeen before, that Meſha king of Moab payed a tribute to Ahab king of Iſrael of a hundred thouſand lambs, and as many rams with their wool [x]. Jehoſhaphat drew likewiſe a conſtant ſupply of ſmall cattle from the Arabians [y]; from which we may conclude, that all thoſe nations, that were tributary to the Jews, paid their tribute in ſuch commodities as their country abounded moſt with, whether for food or raiment. It muſt be likewiſe remembered, that the country had no woods, parks, or any waſte grounds. The antient Canaanites were already too populous and ſtreightened to leave any part of the land uncultivated. Their houſes were not more ſpacious than their families required, and their gardens and orchards did equally afford them nouriſhment with their fields and vineyards; ſo that tho' the Jews had doubtleſs loſt, in a great meaſure, their ſkill in agriculture, as well in Egypt (where they were otherwiſe employed, and where the lands were manured in a manner peculiar to itſelf) as during their abode in the wilderneſs; yet coming into a country ſo well and ſo thoroughly cultivated, neceſſity alone would have obliged them to imitate the diligence and induſtry of its old inhabitants (G).

AFTER

[x] 2 Kings, iii. 4. See Vol. II. p. 93. [y] 2 Chron. xvii. 11.

(G) There will be nothing ſurpriſing in all this, if we remember what has been obſerved concerning the populouſneſs of Egypt, eſpecially the upper one called Thebais, and of its metropolis, which could ſend out 10000 men and 200 chariots at each of its gates at one and the ſame time ‡; and of what Tacitus tells us of that province, that it furniſhed 700,000 fighting men (5), tho' the ſoldiery were here ſcarce a fourth part of its men, where there were ſo many trades and manufactures which excluded them by the laws from bearing arms; whereas, in Judæa, the ſoldiery made near one half of its male inhabitants. Livy tells us, that Rome, 188 years after its foundation, had 80,000 citizens fit to bear arms (6); and yet, as a judicious author obſerves (7), they could only ſubſiſt from the territories that were about it, which are now altogether barren and uncultivated, and extended at moſt but about half a degree, or 30 miles. We may add, that when it was at the beſt, it was not half ſo fertile as Paleſtine, whoſe extent was five degrees, that is ten times as much every way, as is plain by the geography we have given of it; ſo that even allowing them to be both equally fertile,

‡ See Vol. I. p. 386. & p. 437. & alib. (5) Annal. lib. 2
(6) Lib. i. c. 44. (7) Fleury Mœurs des Iſraelit. c. 7.

Trades and manufactures.

AFTER what has been obſerved here, and in a former note, we muſt not expect to find any trades or manufactures among them before David or Solomon's time, except ſuch as were abſolutely neceſſary; and even theſe were carried on in a different way from other great nations: they built their own houſes, their wives and ſervants ſpun, wove, and made their cloaths, baked their bread, dreſſed their meat, and, in a word, ſupplied the buſineſs of cloth-workers, taylors, ſhoemakers, cooks, bakers, confectioners, and many more. The plainneſs of their food, their cloathing and houſhold furniture, ſome few utenſils excepted, rendered thoſe trades unneceſſary, till a more luxurious way of living got footing among them. We have already ſpoken of all the other particulars except their cloathing, and this was plain and artleſs enough, both in its materials and make, to be done within doors. It muſt not, however, be expected here, that we ſhould give an exact deſcription of their dreſs, becauſe we have no paintings or ſtatues of them, as we have of the Greeks and Romans; but from what we find in the ſacred books, it appears that they had a long looſe tunic and drawers made of linen, next to their body, and a looſe garment, ſomewhat like a cloak, of light woollen cloth, which they threw over their bodies when they went abroad (H). The beauty of populous, and cultivated, the latter muſt produce 100 times as much proviſion as the former, and conſequently be able to maintain 100 times the number of people. Suppoſing then theſe Roman citizens to have made up one third part of the inhabitants, which is the moſt that can be ſuppoſed, the whole will amount to 240,000, which being multiplyed by 100, the ſum of thoſe of Judæa will be 24,000,000 ſouls, which is above three times as many as we need ſuppoſe to have been in Iſrael, from the largeſt account that the holy writ gives us of them. However, leſt this ſhould not ſatisfy every reader, unleſs it can be proved that the land was capable of maintaning ſuch a number, the author above quoted has taken the pains to compute what portion of land will maintain one man, and from the extent of the whole country, to make an eſtimate of the number of people that might conveniently ſubſiſt in it. We ſhall follow our author, or the ſubject, no farther: every reader that underſtands figures, may eaſily convince himſelf, by comparing the number of acres, which a country five degrees ſquare may be reaſonably ſuppoſed to contain, with the largeſt number of its inhabitants, that we find upon record at any time.

(H) The ſcripture at leaſt mentions only theſe two, the one under the name of כתונת Ketoneth, or coat, and the other under that of מעיל, Mebil, or upper garment. The former being next to the of them conſiſted either in the fineneſs of the cloth, or the richneſs of the dye, ſuch as purple, ſcarlet, blue, and yellow; but the plaineſt and moſt commonly worn was the white, be-the ſkin, is reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been made of linen, as the propereſt wear for hot countries, and for a people inured to labour. It was long and looſe, but when they went about any buſineſs, they tyed it about them, whence that expreſſion of girding oneſelf is ſynonymous to getting oneſelf in readineſs. The latter was only a large piece of cloth cut off the whole piece, without ſhaping or ſeam: as for the breeches, they were indeed ordered to be worn by the prieſts, but are probably enough ſuppoſed to have been worn by the reſt for decency ſake; tho' if we were allowed to gueſs at the reaſon of their wearing of fringes at the bottom of their garments, abſtracted from that given in the text, we ſhould be apt to think, that they were deſigned to keep the garment cloſe to the legs by their weight, to prevent the wind or any violent motion throwing them up. As to the coat of many colours ſpoken of immediately after, we have followed our own and the generality of interpreters, tho' it is much diſputed whether the original word פַּסִּים, Phaſſim, doth really ſignify any ſuch thing. Some think it was a robe with a long train; but tho' that might have fitted young princeſſes, yet it is ſcarce credible, that Jacob would have ſent his ſon Joſeph on ſuch a journey with ſuch a cumberſome garb. Others think the word to ſignify a wide kind of ſleeve, narrow towards the ſhoulder, and widening towards the wriſt, ſuch as the Arabians uſed to wear. There is no being certain which of theſe three verſions is right, only ours is confirmed by the Targums, the ſeptuagint and vulgate, which may eaſily outweigh all that is urged on the other ſide, were the ſubject of more moment than it is.

What we have advanced of the Iſraelites being able to ſupply their own wants without the help of artificers, during ſo many centuries, will not appear a matter of wonder to thoſe, who are acquainted with Homer's writings, and remember, that he makes Eumeus make his own ſhoes, and build himſelf ſtately cots for his numerous herds (8), and Ulyſſes to build his own fine houſe and ſhip, whilſt his wife's loom ſupplied the houſe with hangings and carpets, and the family with cloaths (9). So that the Hebrews were not the only people who affected this ſimple way of living, and thought it an inſtance of great wiſdom to be able to ſupply their own wants without the help of other hands. Neither need we go to Plato's commonwealth for parallels of this patriarchal life, ſince there is ſcarce a polite nation in antiquity which did not live up to it as much as the Jews; witneſs the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Phœnicians, Perſians, Greeks, Romans, Carthaginians, Sicilians, &c. witneſs alſo Homer, Mago, Cato, Virgil, Cicero, and other authors who have either wrote upon, or in commendation of it.

(8) Odyſſ. xiv. & xxiii. (9) Odyſſ. v.

cauſe

cauſe it was the natural colour of the linen and wool, and[d] could be more eaſily waſhed; upon which account it is much[h] recommended by Solomon [z], it being highly neceſſary in hot countries to ſhift frequently. Accordingly we find it was uſual among them to make preſents of changes of raiment [a]; tho' probably ſome of them might be richer than others, both as to the ſtuff, the dye, and other ornaments; and theſe might be reſerved to be worn on their ſolemn feſtivals and other public occaſions. As to the youth of both ſexes, it is probable, they did wear their ſtuffs ſtriped or flowered with various colours, ſuch as was that of Joſeph, ſuch as we find was alſo that of Tamar, and of all David's other unmarried daughters [b]. We do not read of any other ornaments to the mens dreſs, except that of the fringes, which were faſtened to a blue ribbon, and ſewed round the border of their garments; and even theſe were ordained only as a memorandum, that their happineſs depended upon their obedience [c]. Some covering they wore upon their head, but the faſhion is not to be gueſſed at; they wore likewiſe ſhoes abroad, and perhaps a kind of ſtockings, but how, and what they were made of, we are equally to ſeek; only their ſhoes, or rather ſandals, ſeem to have been a ſole, either of wood, ſkin, or ſome other material, tyed to the top of the foot, without any other covering; which made the waſhing of the feet ſo frequent among them. All theſe might be eaſily made without artificers.

The dreſs of the women, eſpecially of the rich ones, was indeed more curious, becauſe they beſtowed more ornament upon it, chiefly of needle-work, which was ſtill within their own province. They wore jewels of gold and ſilver, but a great deal of that finery was brought at firſt from Egypt, and more might be eaſily added unto it, as they enlarged their conqueſts, without entertaining any artiſts to ſupply them with it, becauſe their faſhion did not alter as ours do. However, it is not improbable, that they had ſome of theſe, as well as ſeveral other rich ſtuffs and linen from Tyre, in exchange for their corn, balm, and other commodities; eſpecially after Solomon's time, when pride and luxury grew to ſuch a height, that Iſaiah ſpent almoſt a whole chapter in enumerating the coſtly ornaments with which that ſex uſed to deck itſelf in his time [d]; but concerning which it were impoſſible to frame any tolerable idea, becauſe the terms there uſed are unknown to us. One thing may be obſerved from it, that they were very curious in adorning their heads, arms, and feet, and that they wore wore ſome kind of tinkling ornament about their legs, which gave a muſical cadence to their ſteps. Judith's ſandals are particularly taken notice of to have raviſhed Holofernes [e], and the richneſs and elegancy of her other ornaments might give us a clear notion of a complete Jewes's dreſs, were we ſure, that they had not by that time mixed ſome of the Babyloniſh faſhion with it. However, we have a more authentic deſcription of the female garb in the prophet Ezekiel [f]. where the Jewiſh nation is compared to a poor, naked, and helpleſs woman, whom God, out of pity, and huſbandlike kindneſs, cloathed and girded with ſilk and fine linen, attired her head with a crown, or rather mitre, ſuch as that of Judith, and put a jewel upon her forehead, a coſtly chain about her neck, bracelets upon her wriſts, ear-rings in her ears, and ſandals upon her feet. To all theſe we may add the vail, which is often mentioned in ſcripture, and was very neceſſary in thoſe countries, both to preſerve the complexion and the character of women, it being eſteemed highly immodeſt for them to appear without it; but whether they were made of ſome ſuch tranſparent ſtuffs as our gauzes, ſo as that they might ſee their way through them, and at the ſame time give ſome glimpſe both of their beauty and rich ornaments, or otherwiſe, we cannot determine.

[a] Eccle. ix. 8. [b] 2 Sam. xiii. 18. [c] Num. xv. 37. [d] Gen. xlv. 22. [z] Kings v. 5. 23. [d] Ch. iii. 16, & ſeq.

It doth not appear, however, that they fell into this exceſs of finery 'till about the latter end of David's life; 'till then a wonderful œconomy ſeems to have reigned in every family, under the wives at home, and the huſbands abroad. The laborious life of the men doth account for that valour, ſtrength, ſwiftneſs and ſurpriſing exploits, for which the ſcripture doth ſo highly extol them, eſpecially David's worthies [g], and excellent troops [h]. But the immenſe treaſures which that monarch had heaped up, having inſpired him with a deſire of conſecrating ſome part of it to God, by building a ſumptuous temple to him, ſoon introduced a number of artificers (I), ſuch as carvers, maſons, carpenters, joiners, gold

[e] Judith xvi. 9. [f] Ch. xvi. 10, & ſeq. [g] 2 Sam. xxiii. 8. ad fin. [h] Ibid. xvii. 8. & ſeq. & alib. paſſ.

(I) It is ſaid in two places, that Solomon ſent to king Hiram for ſome of his beſt artiſts in metals, ſtone, and wood, becauſe he had none ſo ſkilful among his own ſubjects (10), and preſently after, that he raiſed a levy of thirty thouſand men out of all Iſrael to carry on the work (11); from which we may reaſonably conclude, that

(10) 2 Chron. ii. 3, & ſeq. 1 Kings v. 6. (11) ibid. ver. 13, & ſeq.

the

gold and ſilver-ſmiths, founders, and all manner of workmen in metals, wood, and ſtone; and theſe brought on a number of others, without which they could not ſubſiſt. His ſon Solomon built himſelf ſome ſtately palaces, as well as the temple, and this probably gave his ſubjects ſuch a reliſh of his more elegant way of building, that the number of workmen multiplied ſtill more. The diviſion of the two kingdoms increaſed the miſchief. Jeruſalem and many other places muſt be fortified; chariots and engines of war, and a much greater quantity of arms of all ſorts became neceſſary, which required a ſuitable number of artificers; inſomuch, that we read in the Chronicles of a valley belonging to the tribe of Judah, called by the name of the valley of Charaſhim, or artificers, becauſe it was inhabited only by ſuch [i]. In a word, one may gueſs at the increaſe of them by the number which Nebuchadnezzar carried away captive out of the bare city of Jeruſalem [k], tho' it is plain at the ſame time, that the Jews did never neglect the cultivation of their lands for the ſake of theſe. On the contrary, it is only the product of this laſt, that is ſaid to have been exported [l], whereas that of their other manufactures ſeems to have been all conſumed within themſelves. Solomon himſelf, who opened ſo wide a door to commerce and luxury, was ſo far from thinking it beneath his care, that he not only cultivated it himſelf, as was hinted before, but did alſo earneſtly recommend it to his people, as the beſt means of growing rich, preſerving health, prolonging their days, and leading a quiet and happy life; inſomuch that there is ſcarce a chapter of his proverbs, wherein he doth not enforce it from one or other of theſe advantages. We may even affirm, that he made trade and navigation, though in all appearance his moſt favourite project, ſubſervient to the promotion of agriculture. But as thoſe did in a manner riſe and ſet with him, we ſhall ſuſpend all further account of them, till we come to ſpeak of his reign; the peacefulneſs of which may alſo, in all probability, be the reaſon, why we read of ſo few Jewiſh the former were only deſigned by that politic prince to inſtruct the latter in that great variety of arts, which were neceſſary to execute his noble deſigns, as the moſt curious part was actually done upon the plain of Jordan (12).

[i] 1 Chron. iv. 14. [k] 2 Kings xxiv. 16. [l] Ezek. xxvii. 17.

(12) 2 Chron. iv. 17.

worthies, and brave generals in his days, in compariſon of thoſe, which his warlike father had during his whole life (K).

POETRY is perhaps the only art in which the Hebrews, at leaſt ſince Moſes's time, have excelled all other nations, we had almoſt ſaid, that have been even ſince. It has indeed this great advantage above all others, that the authors of it, being divinely inſpired, ſeem to have conſecrated it wholly to the honour of God, and adapted it to the ſervice of the temple. No wonder then if not only their great law-giver, but their monarchs, judges, prieſts and prophets, men and women, have endeavoured to eternize their memories by ſome excel- Poetry.

(K) The valiant men of Judah are moſt beautifully deſcribed in the 87th Pſalm, under the figure of Sion, which is commonly uſed to ſignify that tribe* ; but it has happened in this, as in many other Pſalms and poetical pieces of the ſacred books, that not only the beauties and energy, but even the ſenſe, has been entirely loſt, and another ſubſtituted which ſcarce will bear that name. We ſhall therefore beg leave to ſubjoin a new and even more literal, or at leaſt idiomatical verſion of this Pſalm, that our readers may ſee a ſpecimen both of the beauty and elegance of it, and how far it has been wronged by all the verſions we have hitherto met with. The elegancy which they have overlooked here, is in the oppoſition between the pronoun זה Zeh, which is commonly uſed to expreſs an inconſiderable perſon ; and the word איש Iſh, which ſignifies a conſiderable one, in oppoſition to אדם, which is uſed to expreſs thoſe of inferior rank ; according to which the ſenſe will run thus :

She [Zion] or the tribe of Judah is founded upon the holy mountains.

The Lord has more love for her gates (or places of reſort) than for all the dwellings of Jacob.

Glorious things ſhall be ſpoken of thee, O city of God.

In mentioning, among my acquaintance, either Rahab (Egypt) or Babylon, or here Philiſtia, Tyre, and Æthiopia, (the phraſe is) Zeh, this inconſiderable perſon was born there, or it has given birth to ſuch a one.

But of Sion it is, or ſhall be ſaid, Iſh ve iſh, this or that great perſon owes his birth to it, ſeeing he who is the moſt high, is to eſtabliſh her ; and ſo on.

We ſhall not go about to juſtify this new verſion ; thoſe who are maſters of the Hebrew will eaſily ſee that it is not only more natural and agreeable to the original, but alſo freer from thoſe expletives which are forced in to make it ſpeak ſenſe ; and criticiſms of this nature would be needleſs to thoſe who are unacquainted with it. This Pſalm we take to be parallel with the 48th, which abounds with ſublime expreſſions in praiſe of Sion, but ſuch as can hardly be reached by any tranſlation.

* Vide int. al. Pſ. lxxvii. 68. & ſeq.

lent performance in this kind: witneſs the two inimitable ſongs of Moſes mentioned elſewhere, thoſe of Deborah and Hannah, the whole book of Pſalms, the Canticles, the thankſgiving of Hezekiah, the book of Job, a great part of the prophet Iſaiah, and the Lamentations; not to mention ſome other prophets, who are likewiſe ſuppoſed, by the loftineſs of their ſtile, to have writ at leaſt part of their prophecies in verſe; concerning which it is univerſally agreed, that nothing can be conceived more majeſtic or more ſurpriſingly ſublime; whether we conſider the variety of action, the greatneſs of the ſentiments, the richneſs of the figures and imagery, or the ſtrength and beauty of the expreſſions. To all theſe we may add, that a ſtrain of the moſt ſeraphic piety, and of the moſt excellent morality, runs through the whole; which conveys into the reader's mind the moſt important truths, the nobleſt precepts and inſtructions, that can poſſibly frame and fit it for all ſtages and conditions of life; whilſt the expreſſions and figures, ſtrong and lofty as they be, are no leſs adapted to the reach and underſtanding of the young and illiterate, than they are to raiſe the deepeſt attention and admiration in thoſe who are the ableſt maſters of it (L). And yet

(L) Such are theſe expreſſions of Moſes: The heaven and the heaven of heavens is the Lord's thy God (13). I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as braſs. Ye ſhall be terrified at the ſound of a ſhaken leaf. You ſhall flee when none purſueth (14). One ſhall chaſe a thouſand, and two put ten thouſand to flight, &c. Such are likewiſe theſe of Iſaiah: To whom will ye liken the Lord, who meaſures the waters in the hollow of his hand, and the heavens with a ſpan; who weighs the mountains in the balance? All the nations of the earth are as a drop of water that ſticks to the bucket, and as the ſmall duſt that remains in the ſcales (15). Or thoſe of the pſalmiſt: The earth trembled, and the heavens dropped at the preſence of God. The mountains ſkipped like rams, and the vallies like young ſheep (16). Who ſtretcheth out the heavens like a curtain, telleth the number of the ſtars, and calleth them by their names (17). He bowed the heavens and came down; darkneſs was under his feet. He rode upon the wings of cherubims (18). He maketh the clouds his chariot, and walketh upon the wings of the wind (19). We ſhall go no farther with inſtances which are innumerable, but obſerve here, that ſome of them have ſuch a complicated beauty, that the beſt part of it may be eaſily loſt to any but an attentive reader, who is likewiſe a good judge of (13) Deut x. 14 (14) Levit. xxvi. paſſ. Deut. xxxii. 30. (15) Iſai. xl. 12, & ſeq. (16) Pſ. lxviii. 8. cxiv. 4. (17) Pſ. civ. 2. cxlvii. 4. (18) Pſ. xviii 9, & ſeq. (19) Pſ. civ. 3.

poetry,

yet it is certain, that, like all antient works of that kind, it frequently alludes to things, cuſtoms, and ſayings, to which we are utter ſtrangers at this diſtance of time, though they were then perfectly known; and that it abounds with words and idioms, whoſe true meaning we are left to gueſs at, for want of ſuch parallels as might determine it to us. From theſe, and the imperfection of modern tongues, one may eaſily gueſs how ſhort all tranſlations muſt come of the beauty and energy of the original; ſo that we may be really ſaid to gueſs at it, as much from the thickneſs of the medium through which we behold it, as from the amazing luſtre it is ſtill able to caſt through it. This is evident from the character which Mr. Gildon, after many others, has given of it: that there is nothing ſo ſweet, ſo tender, and pathetic, and at the ſame time nothing ſo grand, ſo majeſtic, ſo terrible, and ſo harmonious, as the poetic part of the Bible; to which all the heathen verſe is low and flat. We may add, that nothing can be juſter than this character, though both he, and the far greater poetry. Of this kind is the laſt expreſſion we inſtanced in, of walking upon the wings of the wind; for, as a modern author juſtly obſerves (20), wind is generally uſed to expreſs the velocity of any thing; and here the wings of the wind carry with them an idea of the utmoſt fierceneſs of that velocity; ſo that we cannot imagine the ſerene and deliberate walking of the Deity upon a creature of the moſt inconceivable ſwiftneſs, without being filled with the deepeſt wonder and amazement. And yet this inimitable beauty has paſſed unobſerved by many, otherwiſe learned, tranſlators and commentators, who have choſen to render it, who rideth upon the wings of the wind; as if riding upon the wind, which is common to feathers, ſtraw, duſt, &c. conveyed a more natural or ſublimer idea of the Godhead, than the literal one of walking upon it.

This is one of the reaſons why the Pſalms, the book of Job, and ſome other poetic pieces of holy writ, loſe ſo much of their beauty and energy in all verſions (21). However, there is this difference between theſe two books, that the latter cannot bear a literal tranſlation; whereas thoſe of the former, which have followed the original cloſeſt, have ſucceeded beſt; ſuch are in particular the Latin ones of Caſtalio, Buchanan, and Jonſton. This laſt is indeed the moſt literal, and wonderfully diſplays the elegancy of the Hebrew. It has but one fault, namely, its running all along in hexameters and pentameters, which takes off a great deal of its majeſty; whereas had it been all in hexameters, there would not have been a better, as there is not indeed a more exact one in all other reſpects extant, that we know of.

(20) Aar. Hill not. in Gideon. (21) Vid. Pineda Dieg. de Stunic. & al. in Job; Bugenhag. Bucer, Buchan. & al. in Pſal.

part of those who have so highly extolled it, have rather judged of it from the versions they had read, than from any great acquaintance they had with the original.

But though there be nothing more universally agreed on, than the excellency of this antient Hebrew poetry above all others, in all the above-mentioned respects, yet there is scarce a point more debated, or less possible to be determined, than the nature, metre, cadence, and rules of it. Several modern authors have pretended indeed to very signal discoveries in this intricate province, but they have either had the modesty to conceal them from the world [m], or those who have ventured to publish them, have only provoked some learned antagonists to expose their weakness and vanity [n]. The truth is, that those who have made any attempts in this way have been forced to shift, alter, and overturn the order, the words, and punctuation, and sometimes the very sense, in order to bring the text to their rules. This is what a learned modern has done almost in every verse, in a dissertation writ on purpose to prove that Hebrew poetry was writ in rhyme, like that of the French and other modern nations [o]. In order to this, he takes the liberty to lengthen or shorten the verses and syllables, as he thinks fit, without observing any other rule or proportion in them than the jingle of the last words; insomuch that there is not, we will not say with Calmet [p], any of Tully's orations, but we may venture to affirm, any chapter in the old testament, which may not, by the same method, be reduced into rhyming verse. He had more need have said, that the rhyme in those poetical works was not only altogether accidental, but almost unavoidable, unless the authors had made a resolution against it, and taken more than ordinary pains to alter their words, and cramp their diction, in order to shun it. Those that are ever so little acquainted with the Hebrew grammar know, that the terminations of verbs, and even of nouns in the plural, and the junction of the possessive pronouns to both of them, are so alike and uniform, that it would be vastly more difficult to write a poem in blank verse in that tongue, than to have it all in rhyme. And yet it must be owned, that he has displayed a great deal of learning in it, and that several eminent men have embraced his opinion [q], though there is one objection against it which seems almost

[m] F. Vatabl. ap. Mercer in Job iii. Meibon. vid. Journal des Sçavans, 1699. & al. [n] Fr. Goman Lyra David. Th. Herbert. Vid. Cappell. cont. Goman. Bedford cont. Le Clerc. [o] Bibliot. Univers. May, 1688. [p] Comment. in Exod. xv. & alib. [q] Bern. Lami. Carofalo, & al.

insur-

inſurmountable; which is, that there is no rhyme but what is plainly accidental in all the acroſtic or alphabetic pieces we have left, ſuch as ſeveral Pſalms[r], the Lamentations, and ſome few others, where the length of the verſe is determined by the firſt letter of it, and where conſequently the liberty of tranſpoſing and altering the meaſure is quite taken off. Our author doth indeed tell us, that theſe were not deſigned for rhyme but blank verſe; but this is ſaid gratis; and what is more, ſome of them have a greater number of hemiſtics rhyming to one another, than thoſe which are pretended to be written deſignedly ſo; as the reader may ſee by the ſpecimen in the margin (M).

THE

[r] Pſ. xxv, xxxiv, xxxviii, cxi, cxii, cxiii, cxix, & cxlv.

(M) We ſhall inſtance only in the 34th Pſalm, and omit all the blank verſes in it; and here the reader will ſee by the interlineal verſion of them, how accidental, and as it were inevitable, the rhyme is in thoſe that chance to have it.

Ver. 4. I ſought the Lord, and he heard me:
Daraſhti eth Adonai vehanani:
And from all my troubles he delivered me.
Umiccol megurothai itzillani.

5. They looked unto him and were inlightened;
Hibittu elaw venaharu:
And their faces were not confounded.
Uphnehem al jechpharù.

9. Fear ye the Lord, ye ſaints of his:
Iereù eth Adonai kedoſhaw:
For no lack (is) to them that fear him.
Ki aen machſor lireaw.

10. Little lions lack and hunger:
Kephirim raſhù verabevù:
They that ſeek the Lord ſhall not lack Vedoreſhe Adonai lo jachſeru any good.
col tof.

12. What man deſireth life:
Mi haiſh hachaphetz chajim:
Loveth days Ohef yamim to ſee good.
liroth tof.

13. Keep

THE truth is, our ignorance of the true pronunciation of that antient tongue, which, for ought appears, has been loſt ever ſince the captivity, makes it morally impoſſible to determine any thing about it with any tolerable probability; becauſe without it, we never can be ſenſible of the length or ſhortneſs of the ſyllables, or of the harmony of words and verſes, in which a great part of the poetic beauty conſiſts. Had we indeed the ſame helps in this, as we have in the Greek and Latin tongues, we might perhaps have attained an equal knowledge of its quantity and metre, and of the conſtruction and cadence of its verſe; and tho' it is probable, we might not have found it ſo elaborate and regular as that of the other two, yet ſhould not we have fallen into that ſtrange notion of ſo many learned moderns, that it was written without meaſure, form, or regularity. Surely one would think, that Scaliger had never heard of any modern Hebrew poetry, how common ſoever it is, when he adds, that neither that tongue, nor the Syriac, nor the Arabic, were capable of ſuch a conſtraint [f]; for it is plain, even from thoſe ſpecimens which Buxtorf has given us [t] out of ſome of the poetical rabbies, that it is as regular as any we have either in Greek or Latin; and con-

[f] Vide SCALIG. Animadv. in chron. Euſeb. p. 7. EGUBIN. L. CAPPELL. MAR. MARTIN. VASMUTH. PFEIFFER. GROT. in Luc. i. 46. CALM. Diſſert. & al. [t] Theſaur. ling. ſanct. ad fin.

13. Keep thy tongue from evil:
Netzor leſhoneka merah:
And thy lips from ſpeaking guile.
Uſphateka midabber mirmah.

Theſe are in the very order we find them in all Hebrew pſalters, without any tranſpoſition or change. But did the alphabetical order permit it, it is plain, that one might reduce every acroſtic pſalm and poem into rhyme by Mr. Le Clerc's method.

We hope there is no neceſſity to acquaint our readers, that an alphabetic pſalm begins with each of the letters of the alphabet ſucceſſively, either in every verſe, as in the 25th, 34th, and 145th; or every other verſe, as in the 37th; or in every hemiſtic or half verſe, as in the 111th, 112th, and 113th. The 119th doth ſtill differ from all theſe, becauſe every verſe of a ſtanza begins with the ſame letter of the alphabet; ſo that it has twenty two ſtanzas, anſwering to the twenty two letters of it. Thoſe who deſire to ſee a more ſuccinct confutation of this notion, may read our learned Mr. Bedford's treatiſe concerning the temple muſic, where he will find a ſhort but full confutation of Le Clerc.

ſequently,

ſequently, that the Hebrew is as capable of the ſtricteſt poetic rules as they, if we be once agreed in fixing the quantity of the ſyllables. We may add, that they have been ſo far from thinking metre and quantity too great a clog, that they have joined that of rhyme to it; which, whether it be an ornament or not, is nevertheleſs a confinement, tho' not ſo great in the Hebrew as it is in other tongues, for the reaſons alledged a little before. Beſides, it appears further, that the antient Hebrew poetry was confined to ſome certain rules and reſtraints, tho' unknown to us, becauſe, in many of thoſe works, we find ſome letters retrenched, and others ſuperadded, in order to lengthen or ſhorten the verſes or the ſyllables, or to give a ſweeter cadence to them.

ON the other hand, to hear ſome antient authors, both Jews and Chriſtians, ſuch as Joſephus and Philo, Origen, Euſebius, and St. Jerom, expatiate on this ſubject, one would be apt to think, that both the genuine pronunciation of the Hebrew, and all the rules of that poetry, had been preſerved to their time, they give us ſo ſuccinct an account of every poetical piece of the old teſtament. Thus, according to them, the two ſongs of Moſes were written in heroic verſe: the Pſalms were of a mixt ſort, trimeters, pentameters, and others hexameters [u]. St. Jerom has ventured to be ſtill more particular [w], and to tell us, that the ſongs of Moſes, the books of Iſaiah, Job, and ſome others, were hexameters and pentameters; that the Pſalms were ſapphic, iambic, and alcaic, after the manner of Horace, and Pindar; that the Lamentations were of the ſapphic kind; and in his preface to the book of Job he ſays, that from the third verſe of the third chapter, the verſe is moſtly hexameter and pentameter, conſiſting of dactyls and ſpondees; tho' he adds, that it is here and there intermixed with ſome other foot or feet; and that ſome verſes, tho' ſtill more irregular, do yet preſerve ſuch a cadence and harmony, as never fails of pleaſing thoſe who are judges of the rules of poetry. However, with reſpect to Moſes's ſong in Deuteronomy, he ſeems either to have forgot, or to correct himſelf in another place [x], and ſays, that it was wrote in iambic verſe of four feet. The ſame he ſays alſo of the 119th, and ſome other pſalms; concerning which we own ourſelves wholly in the dark. All therefore that we can ſay of him and of theſe learned antients is, that they give us their bare word for what they ſay, for none of them has ventured ſo far as to give us any proof or example of it; ſo that the reader is at liberty to take it or not. But upon the whole, the greateſt part of them, even thoſe two ſolemn ones of Moſes, were certainly of the lyric kind, compoſed and ſet to muſic, ſung in an alternate manner, and accompanied with the ſound of divers inſtruments, and with dances ſuitable to the muſic, as we ſhall ſhew under the next head.

[u] JOSEPH. Ant. l. ii. c. ult. l. iv. c. ult. vii. c. 10. PHIL. in vit. Mos. & lib. de vit. contemplat. ad fin. ORIG. ap. Euſeb. præpar. l. xi. c. 2. [w] Epiſt. ad Paulin. & præf. in chron. Euſeb. vid. & comment. Ezek. c. xxx. [x] Vid. Epiſt. 135. ad Paul. Urbic.

own

IN the mean time, tho' we willingly excuſe ourſelves from entering into the merit of the cauſe, whether or not the Hebrews were the firſt inventers of poetry; becauſe we cannot tell how much they might have brought of it out of Egypt; yet we cannot forbear taking notice of the vanity of the Greeks, who attribute the lyric kind to Orpheus; whereas it is plain, that it was in its perfection among the Jews at the time of the Exod, from that excellent piece which Moſes compoſed immediately after their paſſage through the Red-ſea, which was upwards of 200 years before Orpheus, ſince he is ſaid to have gone a ſtripling to the Argonautic war; that is at ſooneſt about Gideon's time [y]. We ſhall willingly allow them the invention of dramatic poetry; which conſiſting only in imitation, and being calculated to make inſtruction go down, for the ſake of the diverſion that it is interlarded with, ſuited their rough and unpoliſhed genius, ſuch as it was at that time and ſince, much better than that of the Hebrews, who, for ought appears to the contrary, never admitted it amongſt them. For though the author of Job, and Solomon in his Canticles, introduce divers ſpeakers, yet it is plain their deſign is rather to expreſs their ſentiments in a more lively and pathetic manner, than to repreſent any action ſuch as uſually comes into a dramatic piece. Whereas the lyric which conſiſts of muſical hymns and odes, and is adapted to promote the glory and worſhip of God, was the moſt proper to inſpire that people with a more than ordinary delight in it, was chiefly calculated for that end by its firſt Hebrew authors, and has continued in the greateſt vogue and admiration amongſt them ever ſince, inſomuch that it ſeems to have been in ſome manner peculiar to them. Again, if Homer and Virgil are ſo juſtly admired for their judicious choice of ſuch words and phraſes, as carried a ſtrong idea of the action in their very ſound, thoſe who have but the leaſt knowledge of the Hebrew, and will but make ſome attention to this particular beauty, will eaſily feel it in almoſt every line (N); and yet without that air of affectation

[y] See USHER's Annals, Sir Is. NEWT. BEDFORD's Chronol. & al.

of

(N) We ſhould be glad to give ſuch of our readers as are unacquainted with the Hebrew, ſome faint idea of this; but unleſs they can forget for a moment their leſs maſculine pronunciation, 'tis to be feared our labour will be loſt. However in hopes that it may excite a curioſity in thoſe that do, to examine it more nearly in this view, we ſhall venture to ſubjoin the few inſtances following out of the Pſalms.

Let the ſea roar, and the fulneſs of it.
Jirhaam haiom umelo-o. Pſ. xcviii. 7.

Let the floods clap their hands.
Neharoth jimkhau caph. ib. ver. 8.

The Lord alſo thundered from heaven, and the moſt high gave his voice.
Vejarghem baſhamajim elohim, vehelion yiten colo. xviii. 13.

The waters ſaw thee, O God, the waters ſaw thee; they trembled and the depths quaked.
Raùka mayim elohim, rauka mayim; yakhilu, aph yirghezu tehomoth. lxxvii. 16.

Mountains ſkipped like rams, vallies like young ſheep.
Heharim rakkedu ke-elim, gebaghoth kibne tzon. cxiv. 4.

For God is high, the proud afar off he beholdeth.
Ki rom Elohim, geboagh mimerkhak yeidagh. cxxxviii. 6.

All the horns of the wicked will I break.
Col carne reſhaghim agadeah. lxxv. ult.

And now her carvings, at once, with axes and hammers do they break.
Veghatta pettukhiah jakhad bacaſhill vehalaphoth gabalouun. lxxiv. 6.

Chariot and horſe are caſt into a deep ſleep.
Nirdam varrekeb vaſſus. lxxvi. 6.

And in my God I will knock down an ox.
Ubelohai adaleg ſhoor. xviii. 29.

The reader will eaſily judge of the reſt by theſe few, the three laſt of which are well worth, at leaſt, that ſo much admired one of Virgil, Protumbit humi bos; or any other of that poet, or of Homer.

But not to dwell longer on this elegancy, it will ſuffice to ſay upon the whole, that whoever makes any tolerable attention to the beautiful choice of words, wherever the ſubject is of the fectation and ſtudy, which viſibly appears in thoſe two poets, eſpecially in the latter. We may here add, that if the moſt beautiful figures and the ſtrongeſt metaphors and allegories, be a ſign of a poetic tongue, the Hebrew exceeds both the Greek and all others that we know of, in this particular alſo.

Muſic. WHAT their muſic was, with which they uſed to accompany and enliven their poetic performances, we know little of but from conjecture. We have indeed nothing left of it, ſame nature with the inſtances given above, he will find them fall with a ſuitable force and rapidity, like the cataracts of the Nile; and where the ſubject is of a contrary nature, he will diſcover in them the moſt ſurpriſing ſmoothneſs and harmony that can be imagined. But of this laſt it will be ſtill more difficult to give our Engliſh readers any tolerable idea; becauſe an unknown language, tho' it were the Italian, will always carry a diſtaſtful harſhneſs to the ear, which nothing can overcome but a knowledge of at leaſt the meaning of the words. We ſhall therefore content ourſelves with giving them the two or three following inſtances:

Hearken my people to my law; incline your ears to the words of my mouth.
Haazina hami thorati hattu ofnekem leimre phi.

O that my people hearkened to me, that Iſrael would walk in my ways!
Lu hami ſhomeagh ly, Iſrael bidrakai hallaka.

But my people would not hear my voice; Iſrael would not acquieſce in me.
Velo ſhamagh hami le coli, Iſrael lo abba li.

How amiable are thy tabernacles, O God of Hoſts!
Mah yeddidoth miſhkenotheka, Elohe zebaoth.

My beloved is mine, and I am his; he feedeth among the lillies.
Doddi li vaani lo, harogheh baſhoſanim.

His eyes are like doves by the rivers of water.
Henaw keyonim hal apphike mayim.

Theſe will ſuffice to ſhew the vaſt diſparity of ſounds in thoſe two ſubjects, which is all that we could pretend to. Thoſe who underſtand the original will eaſily feel it in almoſt every line of the ſacred poets; as for thoſe who are unacquainted with it, even the Canticles of Solomon, the ſofteſt and moſt harmonious piece, for ought we know, extant in any language, would loſe the greateſt part of the laſt beauty we have been ſpeaking of.

that

that can aſſure us that it was equal to their poetry; and yet if we judge of the excellency of the one from that of the other, and if the moſt elegant and harmonious words and phraſes, compoſed upon the ſublimeſt ſubjects, could inſpire a muſical perſon with a ſuitable melody, it will be abſurd to ſuppoſe their muſic to have been otherwiſe than ſweet, elegant, and beautifully varied, tho' attended with a noble gravity anſwerable to the grandeur of the ſubject and occaſion. Muſic and poetry are juſtly obſerved to be twin-ſiſters; they both ſpring from the ſame liberal faculty. To imagine therefore any ſuch inequality between them, would be to ſuppoſe, that it requires greater talents to form a good muſician than a good poet; which is far enough from being the caſe. However, were we to judge of the latter by what ſome learned commentators have conjectured, concerning both it and the muſical inſtruments of the Jews [x], one would rather think them antipodes. Indeed nothing can be more oppoſite than the ſuppoſition of their having ſo exquiſite an ear for poetry, and ſo dull a one for muſic. For ſuch we muſt ſuppoſe theirs to have been, if we can perſuade ourſelves that they admitted ſuch dull and inſipid inſtruments into their concerts (O); inſtruments which were only fit to grate the ear, and [x] See LE CLERC's Eſſ. RHEINFERD, CALMET, & al.

O that my people hearkened to me, that Iſrael would walk in my ways!
Lu hami ſhomaagh ly, Iſrael bidrakai ballaka.
But my people would not hear my voice; Iſrael would not acquieſce in me.
Velogh ſhamagh hami le coli, Iſrael to abba li.
How amiable are thy tabernacles, O God of Hoſts!
Mah yedidoth miſhkenotheka, Elohe zebaoth.
My beloved is mine, and I am his; he feedeth among the lilies.
Doddi li vaani lo, haroeh bashoſanim.
His eyes are like doves by the rivers of water.
Henaw keyunim hal appike mayim.

(O) Thus Le Clerc has taken ſome pains to prove, that the צלצלים tzeltzele, which our verſion after the Septuagint renders cymbals, were only a couple of hollow demi-globes of braſs or ſome other tinkling metal, and about ſix inches in diameter, which they uſed to ſhake one againſt another, like a pair of caſtanets †; be-

† See his Eſſay on Heb. poetry in Bibliot. Univerſ. Tom. ix. ad fin. & alib.

and ſpread the harſheſt diſcord through the beſt compoſitions. It appears, on the contrary, that thoſe inſtruments which were moſt cauſe we find ſome ſuch inſtruments to have been in uſe among the antients, and becauſe the root tzalzal doth often ſignify to tinkle. Etymologies are at beſt very uncertain, and very often ridiculous. Might we not juſtly laugh at a foreigner who ſhould pretend to give ſuch an awkward deſcription of a baſs-viol, as he found them under thoſe two words in his lexicon? We own, that ſuch tinkling inſtruments were uſed among the antients; but the diſtinction which the pſalmiſt makes of tzilzele ſhamagh and tzilzele terughah (22), and the other inſtruments which he joins with them, do at leaſt imply ſomething more muſical, warlike, and maſculine, if not more melodious, than two ſuch demi-globes.

The ſame may be ſaid of the עוגב bugab, which we tranſlate the organ, and which is thought by our moderns to have been no more than a row of ſix or eight pipes, of different lengths and notes, and which was played by paſſing them ſucceſſively under the upper lip (23). According to this deſcription it muſt have been incapable of any regular harmony; tho' in its etymon it ſignifies a lovely inſtrument, from עגב hagab, to love or delight in, to doat upon. But not to inſiſt upon the name, it is plain, this inſtrument was known before the flood (24), and it is ſcarcely credible it ſhould have received ſo ſmall an improvement in all that long interval, and in a nation where poetry and muſic had been ſo highly cultivated.

The שלישים ſhaliſhim, one of the inſtruments with which the women came to meet Saul (25), and which the Septuagint tranſlate cymbala, St. Jerom ſiſtra, and our verſion, inſtruments of muſic, is ſuppoſed to have been of a triangular figure, like the Δ, through which were ſtrung a parcel of rings, ſo that the inſtrument being ſtruck with a ſtick, or ſhaken by the hand, made the rings ſtrike both againſt it and one another, and cauſed a moſt inharmonious jarring. But if it muſt needs be ſuppoſed to have been triangular, becauſe the word שלישים implies the number three (though it might as reaſonably be ſuppoſed to mean an inſtrument of three ſtrings, and a very muſical one too), we ſee no reaſon why its triangular form might not be deſigned to contain a ſet of ſtrings one longer than another, in order to be played upon, either with ſticks as our old dulcimers, or with the fingers, like the harp. As for the account which the Jewiſh writers give of theſe, and ſeveral other muſical inſtruments mentioned in holy writ, it is ſtill more pitiful. But this is not ſo much to be wondered at; their muſical, as well as their poetic, genius has left them long ago: but if thoſe who are judges of either can ſuppoſe ſuch a vaſt diſparity between them to be poſſible, and that the dulleſt and moſt muſical inſtruments were uſed moſt in vogue amongſt them were really muſical and harmonious. We read of eight and ten-ſtringed inſtruments; of the nebel and kinor, which we conjecture to be like the lute and harp, and from which the Greeks had their naba and cinyra. They had likewiſe ſeveral kinds of wind inſtruments, ſuch as the trumpet, flute, and what ſeveral antient and modern verſions call the organ, whatever reſemblance it might have to ours. To theſe they joined the drum, and perhaps the kettle-drums (which we take to be the inſtruments ſpoken of in the laſt note), eſpecially when their muſic was accompanied with dances, as it generally was; and theſe, if artfully touched, could not but give a wonderful cadence to them.

(22) Pſal. cl. 5. (23) Ib ver. 4. (24) Gen. iv. 21.
(25) 1 Sam. xviii. 6.

BUT, if we may judge of the excellence of the Hebrew muſic from its wonderful effects, ſuch as we find it had upon Saul in his moſt melancholy and diſtracted moods [a], and in calming the ſouls of the prophets, and fitting them for divine inſpiration [b], which is no more than the Greeks tell us of their own, and which can hardly be denied without giving the lye to a cloud of antient authors; we ſhall be forced to own, that it was vaſtly more moving than any thing we have now. And indeed what wonder is it that it ſhould have to enliven the harmony of the moſt ſublime poetry, we freely own we cannot join with them; and that though it be never ſo impoſſible to come at any notion of the nature and ſymmetry of thoſe inſtruments, yet we cannot forbear thinking, that they muſt have been vaſtly more ſuitable to it, than any of thoſe which our moſt diligent ſearchers have yet been able to diſcover.

[a] 1 Sam. xvi. 23. & xix. 9. & ſeq. [b] 2 Kings iii. 15.

It would be loſt labour to go about giving a further account of all the various kinds of muſical inſtruments mentioned in holy writ, which the Jewiſh rabbies reckon to the number of 34, by taking the titles of ſeveral pſalms, ſuch as Miſtan, Sigaion, Sheminith, &c. for particular inſtruments on which theſe pſalms were to be played. But ſetting even theſe aſide, there will be ſtill at leaſt twenty different ſorts left, which we ſhall however forbear mentioning, becauſe we know ſo little of them, and have ſo little reaſon to be ſatisfied with the conjectures of commentators about them. All that we ſhall ſay further is, that they were of three kinds, namely, 1. Wind inſtruments, ſuch as the ſeveral ſorts of flutes, trumpets, and the organ, 2. ſtringed inſtruments, of this kind were the harp, lute, inſtruments of three, eight, and ten ſtrings; and, 3. ſuch as were beat either by the hand, or with a ſtick, as the tabor, drum, kettle-drums, and ſuch like. To go farther upon the ſubject would be venturing in the dark. The reader may, if he pleaſes, ſee a fuller account of them in Calmet's diſſertation quoted in page 399.

attained

attained to such perfection, if we consider the great distance of time between its first author Jubal [c], and Moses; and that from the latter's time downwards, it was in constant use, both in their worship, in their religious and civil festivals, in their public and private rejoicings, and even in their mournings; witness that which David composed on the death of Saul and Jonathan [d], and the lamentations of Jeremy at the death of king Josiah? But what improvement it may have received from David's time may be easily guessed, if we consider the great encouragement which that monarch gave it: he was a good musician, as well as an excellent poet; and how much a prince's inclination contributes to the advancement of any art, is obvious to every one. What progress then may we not suppose was made in it, by those 4000 Levites, whom he wholly devoted to that province, under the tuition of 288 excellent masters, with Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun at their head [e]? The law had already provided for their maintenance another way; and the addition which their merit could procure, joined to the natural desire of excelling, was spur sufficient for men, who had nothing to take them off from it, to bestow their whole time and application upon so delightful and so profitable an art. Besides these, who assisted constantly by turns at the altar of burnt-offering, but in much greater number at all solemn festivals, we read likewise of women, who applied themselves to music, both vocal and instrumental: such were Heman's three daughters [f], and those which are mentioned by the psalmist [g]. Their kings had also their own musicians of both sexes [h]. Some of the Psalms, especially the 20th, 21st, and 72d, are supposed to have been composed in order to be sung on the day of their inauguration. The 45th and the Canticles are reckoned a kind of epithalamium proper for a wedding-day. We have seen likewise that they had proper psalms and hymns, not only at the temple, for every great festival, and other public occasions, but also at their private feasts, such as weddings, circumcisions, and the like. In a word, no nation seems to have been fonder of music than the Jews; insomuch, that though the Babylonish captivity had made them hang their harps upon the willows, yet at their return we find they brought back a troop of 200 musicians of both sexes [i].

[c] Gen. iv. 21. [d] 2 Sam. i. 17. & seq. [e] 1 Chron. xxiii. xxv. 7. & seq. [f] Ibid. ver. 5. 6. [g] Ps. lxviii. 25. [h] 1 Chron. xxv. 2. 2 Sam. xix. 35. Eccles. ii. 8. [i] Ezr. ii. 65.

FROM

From all this the reader may eaſily judge, whether it be credible that an art of ſo long ſtanding, ſo much admired, encouraged, ſo univerſally practiſed, and capable to cauſe ſuch wonderful effects, could be ſo rude and plain, as to conſiſt only in the variety of voices and inſtruments, playing all to the ſame notes, without any combination of even baſs and treble, much leſs of the other parts, which make up the ſoul of muſic [k]; and that chance, at leaſt, ſhould not have led them to obſerve the harmony of ſome, as well as the harſhneſs of other compound notes, ſo as to point out this improvement to them, in ſo long a time, and among ſuch variety of voices and inſtruments. For our part, we think it as difficult to imagine, as it is to account for the ſurpriſing effects we read of it, from bare ſimple tunes, how fine and melodious ſoever. One thing ſeems more than probable from the ſtyle of ſeveral of the pſalms, and the frequent tranſition from the firſt to the third perſon; that it was performed alternately, one part of the chorus anſwering to the other at proper ſtanzas and diviſions, not unlike the choirs of our cathedrals [l]. What other improvements they might have made to this art, which we are wholly ignorant of, is not ſo eaſy to gueſs at, as how and when they might be loſt.

IT is indeed generally objected, that the roughneſs of the Hebrew, its abounding with conſonants, gutturals, and monoſyllables, makes it ſo unfit for muſic, that it would be even madneſs to attempt it. Were this indeed really fact, it would at once explode all that we have ſaid on the other ſide; but we hope we have already ſufficiently ſhewn the contrary, in thoſe few inſtances we have given in the former note. We may even venture to affirm, that ſome pieces of Hebrew which we have ſet to ſuitable muſic, would eaſily convince any impartial judge, that this objection is wholly imaginary, and ſprings partly from the want of due attention to that neglected tongue, and partly from our preſent unaccountable fondneſs for the modern Italic taſte, rather than from any inharmonious roughneſs in the Hebrew numbers. It is even certain, from the excellent compoſitions which have been made in our own native Engliſh, tho' in moſt reſpects (gutturals excepted, which, by the way, are far from unmuſical) the moſt like the Hebrew of any modern language, that the perfection of muſic doth not conſiſt in that

[k] See CALMET Diſſert. de Muſic. Heb.

[l] BEDFORD's Diſcourſe on the ſame.

ſmooth

smooth sinking softness we are now so taken with. We are well satisfied, on the contrary, that many of us, who fondly imagine that our age hath raised music to its zenith, would be strangely surprised to find, by comparing its most admired performances with those of two, three, or more centuries past, some of its noblest beauties and excellencies quite lost, not to be recovered again to the world, till it has recovered its genuine taste, that is, perhaps, not till we have a new heaven and a new earth (P).

This is certainly true; at least with respect to divine music, how much soever it may be thought to have been improved by art. And a music-master, in the height of pleasure and good humour may as well pretend to direct my heart and voice how to express my anger and resentment, as to compose, for instance, a Te Deum which shall inspire its hearers with the highest sense of gratitude to the divine goodness, unless he be in the same temper as the royal musician, when he said, My heart is ready, I will sing——m.

WHAT has been said of the Hebrew music may be also supposed of their dances, namely, that those that were of a religious nature, were generally more grave solemn, and suitable both to the music and words, and to the occasion, than their other sorts; but whether confined to any rules as ours are, or rather directed only by custom and imitation; whether circular, as is generally supposed, or of any other form, we can only guess by those of other antient nations. But even this being all conjecture, and the subject not worth a further enquiry, we shall now pass to another, which is somewhat better known to us. As to the Hebrew

m Psal. cviii. 1

(P) This reflection is not designed to affront the present age, but partly to excite some able judges to recover, if possible, vast numbers of inestimable pieces in this kind, and to revive the memory of their worthy authors, who now lie shamefully buried in oblivion; and partly to prevent the dangerous effects of the taste now in vogue; for if it be undeniable, that music is capable either of softening the roughest tempers, or of inspiring the soft and debonnaire with more heroic and noble sentiments, according as it is skilfully managed by a good master; we need not say which of the two this age stands most in need of; and experience shews, that the hardest metals, as well as roughest tempers, may be softened so long, and so much, as to become quite useless.

poetry

poetry, muſic, and dances, the reader may, if he pleaſes, conſult the authors quoted in the margin [n].

Of the language, writing, and learning of the Jews.

THEIR tongue was the Hebrew, ſuch as we have it in the writings of Moſes, and other ſacred authors. We have elſewhere given the moſt probable etymology of that name [†], ſo that we are far from thinking, that it was called ſo from Heber, in whoſe family alone it had been preſerved in its purity, as the parent of all the reſt, as ſome authors have imagined [o]. What we have ſaid formerly, both about the confuſion of languages in general, and of the uncertainty of the Hebrew being the mother, much leſs the original tongue, doth ſufficiently expoſe the fondneſs of ſuch a notion. We ſhall not therefore repeat what has been ſaid already [*], but confine ourſelves to what was there promiſed; namely, to give ſome further account of the genius, and of thoſe particular excellencies of the Hebrew tongue, for which it is ſo generally ſuppoſed to have been the mother of all others. But without engaging ourſelves too far into the merit of the cauſe, we do willingly give up the conceit of ſome antient fathers, [p] who from the words of the pſalmiſt [q], when he (Iſrael) came out of Egypt, and heard a language which he knew not, have imagined, that to the many favours which God ſhewed to that people at their deliverance out of Egypt, he added this one, of inſpiring them with an immediate knowledge of the ſacred tongue. As to what is farther urged in favour of it by ſome critics, that we find in it the greateſt number of the apteſt etymologies and roots, both of men and things, the ſame has been alſo urged in favour of the Chaldee and Syriac, Arabic, Æthiopic, Armenian, and almoſt of every eaſtern tongue; yea, and we need not wonder much at it, ſince a modern author has even found this mother tongue in the Flemiſh (Q). But tho' we do allow the preference to [n] Vid. MERCER. SKIKARD, MEIBON, GOMAR, LE CLERC, CALMET, & al. [†] See Vol. II. p. 355. not. A. [o] Vid. Auct. ſup. citat. ſub lit. f. g. p. 152. [*] See Vol. I. p. 303, & ſeq. [p] ORIGEN lib. 3. cont. Celſ. GREGOR. NYSSEN. Orat. 12. cont. Eunom. THEODORET quæſt. 61. in Gen. & al. [q] Pſal. lxxxi. 5.

Hebrew tongue

(Q) This is what a Flemiſh antiquary has endeavoured to do (26) from a conſiderable number of etymologies of primitive to the Hebrew in this respect, yet we have already proved etymolygies to be too uncertain a foundation to build upon; if therefore this last has any advantage over the rest, with respect to its being the mother rather than a daughter to any of them, it must be upon the account of its simplicity, its pureness, energy, fecundity of meanings and expressions, notwithstanding its natural barrenness of words; over and above its great affinity to all these tongues, which it seems to excel in all these particulars. To this may also be added the significancy of the names both of men and brutes, the latter of which are generally allowed to express their nature and properties in this, more than in any other known tongue; not to insist on the antiquity and venerableness of its writings above all others; all which seem to speak much more in its favour than of any other. From all this we may reasonably conclude, that if we could know it as well and as fully as it was in Moses's time, we might find still greater arguments on its side (R).

(26) Gorop. Becan. Origin. Antwerp. lib. 5. paſſ.

But as far as we understand, and are able to judge of it at this great distance, and from those few books we have left of it, this will be hardly contested, that its genius is pure, primitive, natural, and exactly conformable to the native simplicity of the Hebrew patriarchs; its words are concise yet expressive, derived from a small number of roots, yet without the studied composition of the Greek and names, as of Adam from Haas-dam, Eve from Ev-vat, Abel from Haas-belg, Cain from Quaat-ende, and many others, which are so forced and unapposite, that one would have rather taken it as a burlesque upon etymologists than for a serious piece, had he not taken such pains to tell his readers that he was in very good earnest.

(R) It must be owned, however, that several learned critics have observed several defects in it, as we have it now in the sacred books, which plainly shew that if it was the original tongue and the parent of the rest, it must have suffered many changes, such as the losing of a great number of its primitive roots and idioms, and adopting those of strange nations (27). Of this number are generally allowed all roots that have above three letters, besides very many scriptural words, whose roots are entirely lost. However this is plain from the books we have still extant, that from Moses's time to the Babylonish captivity it has continued the same, without any visible improvement, or indeed without any change, either for the better or for the worse.

(27) Vid. Grot. de verit. Rel. Chr. not. 16, & seq. & Comm. in Gen. ix. Huet. demonst. Evang. Genebr. Cluver. Horn. Cappel. & al. mult.

Roman.

Roman. It has the happieſt and richeſt fecundity in its verbs of any tongue, either antient or modern, which ariſes from the variety and ſignificancy of its conjugations, ſome of which do even imply a whole phraſe, and cannot be well expreſſed in any other without paraphraſing. Thus, for inſtance, to love, to be loved, to love vehemently, to be loved vehemently, to be made to love, or to be loved, and to love oneſelf, are expreſſed by the ſame verb with a ſmall variation, in ſome only of the points, and in others of one or at moſt two letters. Thus again, the change of conjugation doth make a verb expreſs a contrary ſenſe or action, as to bleſs and curſe, honour and diſhonour, to root in, or cauſe to take root, and to root out utterly (S). Pronouns and prepoſitions are only ſingle letters, but the former at the end, and the latter at the beginning of a word. The grammar is ſimple, eaſy, and natural. There is no difference in their nouns, but what is abſolutely neceſſary to expreſs gender and number, and their caſes are diſtinguiſhed

(S) This excellency, ſo peculiar to this tongue above all others, is further diſplayed by Bellarmine in his Hebrew grammar, to the following effect: Every verb (ſays he) doth imply either an action, or paſſion, or neither, or both; the active verbs ſignify the action of a man either upon himſelf or upon another, and if the latter, it is cauſed either by himſelf, or by the means of a third. Here then the action of a man upon himſelf is found in the conjugation Hithpael, which therefore admits of no paſſive to anſwer it; becauſe in this caſe, the ſame perſon is agent and patient. Pihel expreſſes the action of one thing upon another, to which anſwers the paſſive Puhal; if the action be cauſed by means of a third, you will find it in the conjugation Hiphil, to which anſwers the paſſive Hophal. The neuter verbs are to be found in the conjugation Kal, which containing alſo ſometimes verbs of active ſignification, that of Niphal anſwers to them in a paſſive ſenſe. Laſtly, the common verbs are to be found in the conjugation Pohel.

Thus by theſe eight conjugations, or flexions of one and the ſame root, performed by the addition or change of a few points, or of a letter or two, is expreſſed all the variety of ſignifications, into which it is poſſible for a verb to be branched out, and which can hardly be done even in any of its derivatives, much leſs in the Greek, Roman, &c. without circumlocution. To this we might add the ſimplicity of its primitive roots, conſiſting at moſt of three letters; of its compoſition, whether with reſpect to the pronouns joined with them, with their adverbs, prepoſitions, &c. and many other particulars; but all theſe are ſo well known to he learned, and ſo hard to be underſtood by the reſt, that we ſhall beſtow no more time about them.

by articles, which are only ſingle letters at the beginning of the word. The ſame ſimplicity runs through all the moods and tenſes of their verbs, and indeed throughout their ſyntax and concordance. Their words follow one another in an eaſy and natural order, without intricacy or tranſpoſition, without ſuſpending or clogging the ſenſe by long-winded periods, ſo that their ſtyle could not but be extremely free and clear whilſt it continued a living tongue; and if in ſome caſes it appears otherwiſe to us at this great diſtance, it is owing either to its frequent alluſions to cuſtoms and things then univerſally underſtood, and ſince loſt; or to our being in the dark about the true meaning of a great number of words and proper idioms, which we are forced to ſeek for in the Chaldee and Arabic, tho' often without ſucceſs, and ſeldom with any tolerable certainty of having found the right one. Some of their manners of ſpeaking there are likewiſe which ſeem to us flat and uncouth, which will upon due examination, appear not only the moſt natural and exact, but argue perhaps a clearer and more ſolid judgment in thoſe that uſed them. Of this nature is their introducing perſons in their narrations, ſpeaking their own words inſtead of affecting to repeat them in their name; it is, for inſtance, the common ſtyle of the divine writers to expreſs themſelves thus, And God ſaid to Abraham, I am thy ſhield and thy exceeding great reward, inſtead of God told Abraham, that he was his ſhield. And Abraham ſaid, O that Iſhmael might live! inſtead of he intreated God for Iſhmael's life. This every one knows, is the conſtant language of all the writers of the old teſtament; but whether or no it will be allowed to be the moſt natural and exact way of writing, it cannot be denied to be a certain mark of the moſt antient ſimplicity, which we cannot ſay doth run with the like conſtancy and pureneſs through the Chaldee, much leſs in the Syriac, Arabic, and other antient tongues; ſo that upon all theſe accounts the Hebrew ſeems to bid faireſt for being the parent of the reſt. The Chaldee bears the greateſt affinity to it in many reſpects, tho' it ſeems to have been rather a daughter than a mother to it. However, as nothing can be poſitively decided on either ſide, we ſhall only obſerve farther with reſpect to the Hebrew, that it is of all others the moſt conciſe, maſculine, pathetic, and freeſt from lightneſs and bombaſt; upon which accounts a judicious author ſays of it, that it comes neareſt to the language of ſpirits, who ſtand in no need of words to convey their minds to one another [r].

[r] Fleury Mœurs des Iſraelites, ch. 20.

IT is indeed far otherwiſe with their way of writing, tho' we ſhould allow it equally eaſy and natural to write from the right to the left as they did, or from the left to the right as the Greeks, Romans, and Moderns do; for whether we take it to have been the ſame with the preſent character in which we have the ſacred books, which yet is univerſally allowed now to have been the old Aſſyrian, and introduced only ſince the Babyloniſh captivity, or whether we take it to have been the old Samaritan, which has been preſerved only in ſome few medals, and in the Samaritan pentateuch, which is now the moſt received opinion; ſure it is, that the former ſeems rather to have been contrived for beauty than expedition, whilſt the laſt is the fartheſt from either, and is perhaps the moſt uncouth and unnatural, the moſt puzzling and unſightly, that ever was invented; inſomuch, that it is ſcarcely credible, that ſo judicious a perſon as Moſes was, would ever have made uſe of it, if he had known of any better being extant at that time. This the reader will beſt judge of by the alphabet following, by which he will ſee ſufficient reaſon to juſtify Ezra, and thoſe who changed them for the more elegant and commodious Aſſyrian, if they did really ſo, and the Samaritan was really the old one. Character.

The

The HEBREW ALPHABET.

Samaritan.	Chaldee.	Names.	Power.	Numbers.	Final.
𐤀	א	1 Aleph	Aspiration	1
𐤁	ב	2 Beth	B	2
𐤂	ג	3 Gimel	G	3
𐤃	ד	4 Daleth	D	4
𐤄	ה	5 He	H	5
𐤅	ו	6 Vau	V	6
𐤆	ז	7 Zain	Z	7
𐤇	ח	8 Cheth	Ch	8
𐤈	ט	9 Teth	T th	9
𐤉	י	10 Iod	I i y	10
𐤊	כ	11 Caph	K	20	ך
𐤋	ל	12 Lamed	L	30
𐤌	מ	13 Mem	M	40	ם
𐤍	נ	14 Nun	N	50	ן
𐤎	ס	15 Samek	S	60
𐤏	ע	16 Ain	H gh ngh	70
𐤐	פ	17 Peh	P ph	80	ף
𐤑	צ	18 Tzade	T tz	90	ץ
𐤒	ק	19 Coph	K	100
𐤓	ר	20 Resh	R	200
𐤔	ש	21 Shin	Sh s	300
𐤕	ת	22 Tau	Th th	400

THAT this is the exact number and order of their letters is demonstrable from those acrostic pieces, both in the psalms and elsewhere, whose every half or whole verse, or every other verse, begins with one of these letters successively, as we mentioned it under the last article. It is likewise universally agreed, that the Samaritan letters are either the same, or very near so, with the old Phœnician. This we have hinted already †, and it is far from improbable, that the old Egyptian

† See Vol. II. p. 320.

was

was alſo very like it [r], ſo that Moſes, who was learned in all the wiſdom of Egypt, might write his laws in that character. Sir Iſaac Newton indeed thinks that he had it from the Midianites [t]; and we have, in more places than one of this hiſtory, concluded it highly probable, that not only they, but all their trading neighbours had the art of writing very early *, though it be not poſſible to determine, whether each nation had a peculiar one of their own, or the ſame in common to them all, much leſs to aſcribe the invention of it to its true author (T).

HOWEVER,

[r] Vid. PLUTARCH lib. de dæmon. Socrat. KIRCHER. VOSS. CAPPELL. & al. mult. [t] Chronol. p. 210. * See Vol. II. p. 112, & p. 163, & alib.

(T) Were the Sabeans to be relied upon, we ſhould not be long to ſeek for the firſt inventer of writing and letters, ſince they produce a book which they pretend to have been written by Adam, the character of which, though different from all others (28), might have given the hint to thoſe alphabets that have been ſince uſed. But as their authority weighs but little in this point, others have attributed it to Seth, upon the authority of Joſephus, who tells us, that he cauſed his aſtronomical diſcoveries to be ingraven upon two pillars, deſigned to continue proof, one againſt the flood, and the other againſt the conflagration (29). Others to Enoch, becauſe St. Jude quotes a prophecy of his (30), which they think muſt have been handed down in writing, though much more probably by tradition. Others again to Noah and to Abraham †, but the far greater part of both Jews and Chriſtians, antient and modern, to Moſes, whom very many think to be the ſame with the Egyptian Thoyth or Hermes, mentioned in the hiſtory of that nation (31). Among theſe laſt, ſome believe that the firſt writing was that upon the two tables, and that conſequently God did firſt ſhew it unto Moſes, who taught it to Aaron, Joſhua, and the 70 elders. Moſt of the Jews are of the ſame opinion, and ſome of them add, that there was an alphabet ingraven alſo upon the tables, along the margin, in order to teach him and his people the way of reading the decalogue. But the reverſe of all this ſeems implied in the account which that law-giver gives us of his receiving thoſe tables; he ſays indeed, that they were written by the finger, or, as we

(28) D'Herbelot. Bibliot. Orient p. 726. (29) Ant. l. 1. c. 3. (30) Epiſt. Jud. ver. 14. † See Vol. II. p. 383. note (Q). (31) Ita Rabbin. fer. omn. See Vol. I. p. 481. vid. & Artaph. & Eupolem. ap. Euſeb. præp. lib. ix. c. 17, 18. Rabbin. fer. omn. Lud. Vives comm. in St. Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. 18. c. 29. Grot. not. in verit. Rel. Chr. Huet. demonſt. Evang. Gale. Court of the Gentil. p. 36. & al. innumer.

formerly

HOWEVER, though it be now the moſt received opinion, that the Samaritan was the antient Hebrew character, yet it has been ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by ſeveral learned men [u]. The Talmudiſts not only ſuppoſe the contrary all along, but have declared themſelves for the Chaldee characters even in that place, where they have been quoted for the oppoſite opinion [w] (V), and formerly ſhewed *, by the order and direction of God; but he hints nothing like his being taught to read them, or his inſtructing others in it, much leſs that ſuch a way of writing was taught him by God himſelf, and till then unknown to the world; which circumſtance he can hardly be ſuppoſed to have omitted, had that been the caſe. But we have elſewhere ſhewed, that this art was, in all probability, of much older date among the Phœnicians and other trading nations, than the decalogue, ſo that we can by no means fall in with this notion; though we know of nothing recorded of greater antiquity than that.

[u] HOTTING. cont. MORIN. POSTEL. BUXTORF jun. & al.
[w] Tract. Sanhedr. ap. Walt. prolegom.

(V) We have had occaſion to hint this formerly (32), and the miraculous power by which they affirm the middle of the ם and ם to have been ſupported, doth plainly ſhew, that they did not mean the Samaritan, but Chaldee; becauſe in the former, the ם Mem hath nothing in its figure that required ſuch a ſupernatural ſupport. As to the paſſage quoted out of the Talmud by Walton, and thoſe who have followed him, in favour of the Samaritan againſt the Chaldee, or, as that place calls it, the Aſſyrian letters, if thoſe authors had but had the patience to have read a little farther, they would have found ſeveral anſwers to it, which though neither definitive nor ſatisfactory, yet plainly ſhew that the compilers were of a quite contrary opinion. We ſhall not trouble the reader with the whole paſſage, but only ſubjoin the moſt material things they anſwer in favour of the Chaldee; the firſt of which is to this purpoſe; We have ſtill our columns and our vaus, intimating thereby the likeneſs of the ו to a column with its chapiter, ſuch as its name implies in the Hebrew, whereas the Samaritan vau has nothing in its figure that bears the leaſt reſemblance to it. The next anſwer is, that it is ſaid in the book of Eſther (33), that Mordecai wrote unto all the nations according to their writing and language, and to the Jews alſo according to their language and writing; which laſt, it is there urged, would have been needleſs, if the preſent Hebrew had been the old Aſſyrian character, and the Jews had already adopted it inſtead of the old Samaritan, or any other. To this is ſubjoined a further queſtion, or objection. Why then are thoſe characters

* See Vol. II. p. 561. note (A) ſub fin. (32) Ibid. (33) Eſth. viii. 9.

and there ſeems to have ran an univerſal conſent to them through all their ſucceſſors ever ſince (W). Among thoſe of the Chriſtians, who have declared themſelves on that ſide, there has been one who has taken an unſpeakable deal of pains, to prove the Chaldee character to be the genuine alphabet of nature, becauſe no letter can be rightly founded, without diſpoſing the organs of ſpeech into an uniform poſition, with the figure of that letter. This he has endeavoured to diſplay in 33 copper plates, 22 of which ſhew the pronunciation of the letters, and the reſt that of the point vowels; from which he infers at the ſame time, that the Sa- characters called אשרים Aſhrim? to which the anſwer given is; From the Aſhrim or Beatitudes contained in it, meaning in the ſacred books written in that character.

We beg leave to obſerve here, that we are not vindicating the anſwers of the Talmudiſts, which muſt ſtand or fall according to their worth; but only ſhew, how lightly they have been quoted on that ſide of the queſtion, which they have moſt plainly declared themſelves againſt.

(W) They even tell us at the very threſhold of their grammar, that the names of ſeveral of the letters, which they would have us believe are of almoſt equal antiquity with them, were given them from their figure, as that of others from their ſound. Thus ב the ſecond letter, was called Beth from its far off reſemblance to a houſe, and the ג Gimel from a much nearer one to a camel, the ד Daleth to a door, the ו Vau to a column, ל Lamed to a ſpit, and ſo on; whereas no ſuch reſemblance is to be found in the Samaritan alphabet; but they are wanting in the mean proof, namely, the antiquity of thoſe names, for want of which their concluſion falls to the ground. For the ſame argument might as well be urged in favour of the points Pattach, Kamets, Tzere, Kibbutz, &c. which are now univerſally allowed to be of modern invention, as we ſhall ſee anon; for though theſe names bear no reſemblance to the figure of thoſe points, yet they were invented, in all likelihood, to expreſs the manner in which they ought to be pronounced; as for inſtance, the Pattach, or A, with an open mouth, and the Kibbutz, or U, with the lips cloſely gathered. In like manner, it is probable, they made choice at firſt of ſuch names as could beſt imprint the ſhape of the letter on the memory, by the likeneſs it did bear to the thing by which they were called, as the ג Gimel to a Camel, by reaſon of the bunch on its back, the ע Ain to an eye, the ש Shin to a tooth; and this might as probably have been done, when they began to teach this Chaldee character to thoſe who had been uſed to the old Samaritan, for their eaſier attainment of it, but where the letter bore no likeneſs to any thing that carried the ſound of it, they gave it a name that did, as Mem, Nun, &c.

maritan, bearing no kind of ſimilitude to ſuch a poſition of the organs, could not be the antient Hebrew [x].

THE misfortune is, that all his fine reaſoning, and whatever elſe is urged by others on that ſide, of the queſtion, is intirely overthrown by one fact produced for the other ſide, namely, that of the old Jewiſh ſhekel here annexed, which is inſcribed on the one ſide, THE SHEKEL OF ISRAEL; and on the reverſe, JERUSALEM THE HOLY; not only in this Samaritan character, but as there is ſome reaſon to ſuppoſe, in this Jeruſalaimic dialect. We ſhall refer the further particulars of this coin and its inſcriptions to the next note; and only obſerve here, that by the name of Iſrael in the firſt could not be meant the ten revolted tribes, becauſe they had nothing to do with Jeruſalem the holy, which is on the reverſe. There are alſo ſome pregnant proofs, that it could not belong to the Samaritans after the captivity; one of which among the reſt is, that their hatred againſt the Jews was grown to ſuch a height by that time, that they would have ſuffered any thing, rather than be forced to ſtamp ſuch an inſcription upon their coins. The reader may ſee the whole argument at length, in the authors quoted in the margin * ; from which the Samaritan character is proved to have been the antient Hebrew, and not that which has been, and is ſtill uſed by the Jews and Chriſtians under that name (X).

[x] Vid. VAN. HELMONT Alphabet. Natur.

the

THESE

* MORIN, SIMON, CALMET, WHISTON, & al.

(X) Some of theſe ſhekels were in the poſſeſſion of Maimonides and Rabbi Azarias among the Jews, and of Morinus, Montanus, Villalpandus, and others, among the Chriſtians. The mark on the one ſide is ſuppoſed to have been Aaron's miraculous rod budding forth almonds, and on the other, the pot of Manna. The letters over this laſt not being plain enough, are variouſly conjectured to ſtand for the name of GOD, of Iſrael, David, Jeruſalem, and the like; as for the inſcriptions round thoſe two ſides, bating a ſmall variation of the character and ſpelling between thoſe extant coins, they plainly anſwer to theſe in the modern Hebrew, on the one ſide שקל ישראל Shekel Iſrael ; and on the reverſe ירושלים or Jeruſhalaim Hakadoſhah, Jeruſalem the holy *.

Thus then the argument in favour of the Samaritan characters ſeems to amount to a demonſtration. We can ſee but two things that can be objected againſt it with any colour of reaſon; the firſt is, that conſidering the notorious cheats which have been impoſed upon the world, with reſpect to coins and medals, we ſhould be well aſſured of the genuineſs of theſe, before we venture to decide in ſo weighty a point. The next is, that allowing them to be genuine, and to have been coined before the revolt of the ten tribes, which is more than probable from what we obſerved above of one ſide's being inſcribed the Shekel of Iſrael, yet they may as likely have been the tribute money, which either the Samaritans, or ſome of the Canaanitiſh nations, paid either to David, Solomon, or to ſome of his ſucceſſors. What gives this latter a greater face of probability is, the difference of character and ſpelling between thoſe coins, and which cannot be ſo well accounted for, if we ſuppoſe them to have belonged to a ſingle people, eſpecially that of Iſrael. But if the ſeveral nations of Canaan, for inſtance, were obliged to ſtamp theſe inſcriptions on their tribute money, in token of their ſubjection to the Hebrews, we ſhall not be to ſeek for the reaſon of this difference. Now ſuch an exaction is ſo far from improbable, that we find it has been practiſed afterwards by ſeveral conquerors upon the people they ſubdued; and we ſhall ſhew, in the ſequel of this work, that ſome nations have even choſen to ſacrifice their lives, rather than to comply with this one ſingle mark of ſubjection. We pretend not to determine on either ſide, but if we may be permitted to ſpeak our thoughts concerning the Sama-

* Vid. int. al. Walton. Supplem. in prolegom. de ponder. p. 36. & 38.

THESE characters, notwithſtanding their great affinity to the old Phœnician, if they be not indeed the ſame with them, and the vaſt progreſs of this latter all over the world, would have been entirely loſt, had they not been preſerved to us in the Samaritan pentateuch; by the help of which, we have been able to decypher both the inſcription of theſe ſhekels, which have given ſo great a light to this controverſy, and of ſome other Phœnician medals, of no leſs uſe in other parts of antient hiſtory. But tho' we have had no copies of that book till within theſe 200 years (Y), and conſequently no knowledge ritan and Phœnician characters, it is plain, that as they were never calculated for eaſe and expedition, ſuch as one might reaſonably expect among thoſe trading nations, but rather to conceal learning from the vulgar, as the Egyptians affected to do †; ſo if Moſes choſe to write his laws in them, preferably to any other that might then be in uſe, one can ſcarce ſuppoſe any other reaſon for it, than that of preſerving an awful regard to them.

This might be the reaſon of his ordaining the lecture of them to be made by the prieſts to the people, and of his commanding the parents to tranſmit the main ones to their children by word of mouth; and laſtly, this may be the reaſon why the learned among the antient Jews are called סופרים Sopherim, that is Scribes, according to the generality of verſions, or according to the more literal ſenſe of the word, men that could read or write books.

(Y) Archbiſhop Uſher is the firſt perſon, to whom we are beholden for the firſt copies that ever were brought into Europe; the frequent mention which he met with in the laſt quoted authors, would not ſuffer him to be at reſt, as he expreſſes himſelf (34), till he had procured five or ſix of them from Syria and Paleſtine, and had carefully examined them. What his obſervations, and thoſe of other learned men, are concerning that book, is foreign to our purpoſe, the reader may conſult the authors quoted in the margin about it (35). With reſpect to the character itſelf, we ſhall not pretend to decide, whether the Phœnicians had it from the Hebrews, or theſe from them; ſure it is indeed, that Moſes is the oldeſt writer we know of; but whoever conſiders the vaſt interval between the creation of the world, and the time in which he wrote, the great increaſe of mankind, their early commerce, arts, ſciences, and the like, will hardly think the knowledge of letters to be ſo recent as that law giver's writings. It will be more reaſonable to divide the honour of that invention and its gradual improvements among more nations, and perhaps more ages than one; for without all peradventure, had he known it to have been the invention of one

† See Vol. I. p. 481. (34) Epiſt. ad Lud. Cappel. (35) Morin. diſſert. Hotting. cont Morin. F. Simon Hiſt. Critic u t. Sentimens de quelques Theolog. de Holland. Prideaux Connect. T. 2. l. 6.

ledge of thoſe ſhekels till ſome time after, we muſt not think, the Samaritan pentateuch had been unknown till then, or that the Chaldee had paſſed till then for the original Hebrew character. On the contrary, we find the former often mentioned by ſome of the fathers and other antient authors [y], the greateſt part of whom (eſpecially of the fathers) were of opinion, that the Jews exchanged their old Samaritan for that more beautiful Chaldee which is now in uſe with them, after their return from the Babyloniſh captivity, whilſt the Samaritans choſe to preſerve the antient one. This opinion was likewiſe embraced by many modern critics, even before theſe Samaritan copies were brought into Europe, tho' by a far greater number ſince theſe additional teſtimonies have been brought to light. There has been however a third claſs, who have endeavoured to reconcile the difference, by affirming that the antient Jews had two ſorts of characters, the ſacred and the vulgar; the firſt of which they pretend was the Chaldee now in uſe, and the latter the Samaritan [z]: but as they have given no reaſonable proof for ſuch a diſtinction, it has been juſtly rejected as chimerical; tho' if they had really had two ſuch ſorts of characters, one would rather have ſuppoſed the Samaritan to have been the ſacred, for the reaſons mentioned in a former note.

IT has likewiſe been a famous diſpute among the learned, whether the Hebrews uſed any vowel letters, or whether the points, which are now called by that name, were ſubſtituted inſtead of them, and if the latter, whether they are as old as Moſes, or invented by Ezra, or by the Maſorites. It is not our deſign to enter into that ſpacious field of controverſy, which has exerciſed the wits of the moſt learned critics of the two laſt centuries, and is far from being as yet adjuſted by thoſe of the preſent. It will be ſufficient, we hope, to acquaint our readers with the moſt received opinions upon theſe two heads, and to refer them, for further ſatisfaction, to thoſe authors who have treated on theſe ſubjects ex profeſſo. As to the firſt, it is now the general opinion that the Aleph, He, Vau, Iod, and Ain did ſerve inſtead of vowels, tho' one man, eſpecially of one of the patriarchs, he would not have failed recording him as well as the inventers of muſic, forging, and ſuch like.

[y] Vid. ORIG. Hexapl. HIERON. in Ezek. & alib. EUSEB. CÆSAR, DIODOR. TARSENS. CYRIL. ALEX. PROCOP. SYNCELL. & al. [z] RR AZARIAH AB. de BARTENOR, POSTEL, BUXTORF, CONTING. SGHAMBAT, & al. quid.

they

they were ſometimes omitted, or, as the grammarians term it, underſtood in their declenſions and conjugations, and often varied in their ſound, and had ſometimes the power of conſonants as our J and V; but for this we refer our readers to the grammars of that tongue. Sure it is, that the Samaritans never admitted of any others, tho' they readily read their Hebrew pentateuch by the help of their Samaritan character. The ſame may be ſaid of the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic, which laſt did not begin to uſe points till ſeveral centuries after Chriſt: nay, the Jews themſelves never admitted them in their ſynagogues, no not even to this day. So that it is plain, notwithſtanding the many objections that have been raiſed againſt it, that it may be, and is eaſily read without thoſe points, which have been invented for the greater eaſe of learners, and to preſerve the true pronunciation of that tongue. All that needs be added, with reſpect to their letters, is, that in the ſacred books, as we have them now, ſome words have one letter bigger than the reſt, others leſs, ſome at the beginning, ſome in the middle, and ſome at the end of a word; ſome are ſuſpended, or ſtand higher in the line, and others are turned upſide down (Z). An unwary reader might be eaſily

(Z) There are thirty one places in the old teſtament, in which ſome one or other of the letters of the alphabet are of a larger ſize than the reſt; as the א in אדם Adam, 1 Chron. i. 1. the ב in בראשית Bereſhith, Gen. i. 1. ג in וזת גלח vebith galah, he ſhall ſhave himſelf, Levit. xiii. 33. the ד in אחד Aohad, Deut. vi. 4. and ſo of the reſt. The minuſcula, or letters of a leſſer ſize happen in thirty three places, as the א in ויקרא vajiecra. Levit. i. 1. the ב in דהב hab, give. Prov. xxx. 15. the כ Caph in the word לבבתה libkothah, Gen. xxiii. 2. where Abraham is ſaid to have come to weep for her (Sarah); and where they ſay the ſmallneſs of that letter is deſigned to expreſs the moderation of his mourning, ſhe being an old woman. Moſt of their reaſons for the reſt of thoſe minuſcula are much of the ſame ſtamp. The נ Nun is the only inverted letter, or turned upſide down; it is obſerved to be ſo nine times, but the Jews, inſtead of inverting it in their printed books, do only note it in the margin, thus נ׳ that is, Nun inverted, which they think ſignifies ſome perverſity, or retroaction, implyed in the word, wherein it happeneth to be ſo. The ſame letter is ſuſpended once in the word, מנשה Manaſſeh. Judg. xviii. 30. where, in ſome printed books it is only marked in the margin נ תלויה Nun ſuſpended. The ע Ain is ſuſpended three times, once in Pſ. lxxx. 13. in the word יער, jahar, foreſt, and twice in Job.

We hope it will ſuffice to have juſt hinted theſe cabbaliſtical obſervations, which are not worth dwelling longer upon, unleſs we could eaſily led to think, that theſe differences happened ſince the invention of printing, becauſe ſuch miſtakes are apt to happen frequently in printed books; but it is plain they have been taken notice of a great many centuries before that art was thought upon, and have been religiouſly conveyed down to us in the ſame form, both in the written volumes, ſuch as they have always uſed in their ſynagogues, and in their printed books ſince the diſcovery of that art; as having been deſignedly ſo written by their inſpired pen-men, either to convey ſome extraordinary myſtery, or to imply ſome excellence or commendation, if the letter be of the larger; or if of the ſmaller kind, ſome dimunition and contempt of the thing ſignified by the word in which they are placed, or at leaſt to raiſe either a greater degree of attention to the ſubject, of which we have had occaſion to give an inſtance under a former head †.

As to the numbers which we have ſet over againſt each letter, it muſt be obſerved, that they are thoſe which the Jews have made uſe of time out of mind; but as to the divine pen-men, they never made any uſe of them for numerical letters, but always wrote the numbers in words at length: which we the more willingly take notice of, becauſe ſome chronologers, in imitation of the cabbaliſtical Jews, have pretended to find out and ſettle dates, and rectify epochas; as the latter pretend to find out the weight and meaſure of things, by the help of theſe numerical letters *; and both Jews and ſome cabbaliſtical Chriſtians to find out myſteries in them. Thus it is pretended, that the letter א, which ſignifies either 1, or 1000, occurs ſix times in the firſt verſe of Geneſis, to denote that the world ſhall laſt juſt 6000 years in the condition it is now in, after which it is to be renewed. But all this is ſaid without the leaſt proof that they were uſed to any ſuch purpoſe, either by the inſpired writers, or even by the antient Jews.

THE antiquity and authority of the points is the next thing in diſpute; Jews and Chriſtians have been much divided, one part attributing them to Moſes, and making them equally authentic with the text; and the other to Ezra, and could be ſatisfied both about the antiquity and deſign of theſe variations; which, for ought we know, may be owing to chance; and if they were done with a deſign, yet would puzzle an OEdipus to find it out.

† See before p. 159. not. (H). * See Vol. II. p. 566. Sub. fin. not. (C). Vid. & BASNAG. Hiſt. des Juifs, T. 6. l. 19. c. 8. 20. & ſeq.

the

the men of the great ſynagogue; till the learned Elias Levita [a], a learned German Jew, who flouriſhed at Rome about the middle of the ſixteenth century, did make it appear, that they had never been in uſe till after the finiſhing of the Talmud, that is, according to him, about 500 years after Chriſt. His book ſoon raiſed him a cloud of adverſaries, both of his own nation and of Chriſtians. Among the latter were the two Buxtorfs, who produced ſome cabbaliſtical books of great antiquity, at leaſt boaſted as ſuch by the Jews, in which there was expreſs mention of points (A). Theſe were anſwered by Cappellus and other critics, till Morinus, having examined all that had been urged on both ſides, wrote his learned diſſertation on that ſubject, againſt which there has nothing been replied of any conſequence; whereas his opinion has been univerſally applauded and confirmed by thoſe that have come after. So that it plainly appears, that neither Origen, nor St. Jerom, nor even the compilers of the Talmud, which according to him was not finiſhed till the ſeventh century, knew any thing of them; no, nor even any of the Jewiſh rabbies, that wrote during the eighth and ninth century. He adds, that the firſt footſteps he met with of them were in the writings

[a] ELI. LEVIT. præfat, 3. in Maſoram Hammaſor.

(A) Theſe books are; the בהיר Babir, זהר Zohar, and the כוזרי Kozri. The firſt of theſe is pretended to have been written a little before our Saviour's time; and the ſecond, which quotes and refers to it, not much above a century after. As for the Kozri, the Jews will have it to be about 1900 years old, and to have been an account of a conference between a learned Jew and king Chozroes, in which the latter was converted to Judaiſm †.

In theſe three books mention is made of points more than once or twice, and the latter has this expreſſion about them; that they are the ſame to the letters, that cloaths are to modeſt women, who dare not be ſeen without them. Were the boaſted antiquity of theſe books unqueſtionable, there would be an end at once of the argument; but the Jews fidelity in ſuch things is too well known to be relied upon. However, what ſhews the impoſture of them is, that there are things in them which muſt have been written about 1000 years after their ſuppoſed date, and that none of thoſe books have been quoted or mentioned during that time by any author. Other objections urged by the Buxtorfs and others againſt the recentneſs of the points, the reader will find fully anſwered by Morinus, and the authors quoted after him above.

† De his vid lib. Juchaſin, p. 42. & ſeq. R. Azarias, c. 19. Buxtorf, Cappel. Morin. Baſnag. & al.

of the rabbies, Aaron Ben-Aſher, chief of the weſtern, and Moſes Ben-Naphtali, chief of the eaſtern ſchool; that is, about the middle of the tenth century. So that they can hardly be ſuppoſed older than the beginning of it [b] (B).

AT

[b] Vid. MORIN. Differt. Biblic. CAPPEL. Arcan. punctat. & Diatrib. WALTON. prolegom. DUPIN. VOSS. WASMUTH & al. mult.

(B) We ſhall venture, however, to ſubjoin a ſhort ſpecimen of thoſe points for the ſake of our Engliſh readers. They are reckoned fourteen in number; all of them, one or two excepted, placed under the letter as follows:

Long Points.		Semibriefs.		Quite brief.
אָ Kametz	a	אַ Pathah	a	אְ Sheva	e
אֵ Tzere	e	אֶ Segol	e	אֲ Chateph-patah	ă
אִ Chirek	i gadol	אִ Chirek katon	i	אֱ Chateph-ſegol	e ĭ
אֹ Cholem	o	אָ Kametz hatuph	o	אֳ Chateph-kametz	ŏ
אוּ Shurek	u	אֻ Kibbutz	u

It would be needleſs to dwell longer upon theſe, or to mention ſome differences among grammarians about them; for though the Jews, even thoſe who believe them to be the invention of the Mazorites, look upon them to be of ſuch authority, that nothing can be altered in them; yet the generality of Chriſtians reject ſuch a ſuperſtitious fear, and make no difficulty of departing from them, whenever a better ſenſe may be obtained by a change of them; becauſe it is plain, that their reading doth not exactly agree either with the ſeptuagint verſion, or with that of St. Jerom, or with their targums, or with the Chaldee paraphraſe, the moſt antient of all, or with the interpretation of the antient rabbies; for which reaſon their punctation has been as much ſuſpected by ſome, as it has been cried up by others: So that if we could ſuppoſe the points to have been as old as thoſe antient verſions, we muſt likewiſe ſuppoſe, that their books were differently pointed from thoſe of the Mazorites. All that can therefore be ſaid for theſe laſt is, that they have ſucceeded better in their punctation than Chriſtians could have done, becauſe they had retained the true reading, at leaſt for the moſt part, by conſtant tradition, which we ſhould have had to ſeek for, by the bare help of thoſe antient verſions and paraphraſes, not without an immenſe deal of trouble It is even plain, that they could not ſo much as agree among themſelves about every particular word, tho' they did in the main; hence aroſe that differenc-

AT the ſame time, theſe doctors ſet about inventing and fixing the grammatical points, the comma and full ſtop, to divide the periods and verſes, which till that time had lain confuſed and undiſtinguiſhed, not only in the ſacred, but in all the other Hebrew books (C). This has been alſo a very uſeful work to the world, tho' few Chriſtian interpreters have thought it neceſſary to confine themſelves to their diviſions. On the contrary, there is ſcarce a modern verſion that doth not very reaſonably depart from them, when a clearer ſenſe, a parallel place, or the analogy of faith can bear them out in it. And it is to be believed, that if a new verſion was now to be made of the Old Teſtament, it would alter the punctation of the Mazorites in a much greater number of places than the former have done (D). Notwithſtanding which, it muſt be owned, of lection or punctation, known by the critics by the names of Keri and Ketib.

This brings into our minds a ſtory out of the Talmud, which tho' not of any authority, ſerves to ſhew that their reading was not fixed at that time. There David is introduced reproving his general for not utterly deſtroying the Amalekites, according to the command of God. Joab anſwers, that he had punctually done it, and rooted out the זָכָר Zakar, or the males, and David tells him, that he ought to have rooted out the זֵכֶר Zeker, the memory of Amalek: To which Joab replies, that he had been always taught to read it Zakar, and not Zeker. The reader muſt not however imagine, that theſe differences are conſiderable, or that they leave the ſenſe of the ſcripture too undetermined. This is indeed objected by thoſe who contend for the authenticity of the points; but is fully anſwered by the authors on the oppoſite ſide. This is certain, that tho' the points are a vaſt help, both to the learners of Hebrew, and for a more ready way of reading it, yet when men have made any conſiderable progreſs in that tongue, they not only can read it with eaſe without them, but even chooſe to do ſo (36).

(C) An eminent critic aſſures us (37), that he had examined above 2000 Hebrew manuſcripts of all ſorts, and that he never met with any pointed that were above 600 years old; or at leaſt if the books themſelves were of older date, yet the points were manifeſtly added to them afterwards; and this he affirms, equally of the grammatical and vowel points. And he was ſo ſure that he had made all the neceſſary enquiry after them, that he defies all the advocates for the points, to produce one that could diſprove his aſſertion; which has never been done to this day, that we know of.

(D) This is not at all to be wondered at; the Jews were too tenacious of their old traditions, and had too wrong a bias in eve-

(36) Vid. Method of learning Hebrew without points. (37) Is. Voſſ. de LXX. interpret. tranſlat. c. 30.

ry

owned, that their labour in theſe two reſpects, have proved very ſerviceable to the learned, and that they has made the knowledge

ry thing that related to the religion, and reign of the Meſſiah, to have ſucceeded, tho' roughly, in ſuch an undertaking, if their intentions had been never ſo upright. But it is to be queſtioned, whether their fear of giving the Chriſtians any advantage, has not crampt them more than all the reſt, and made them ſit down ſatisfied with a pointing, which left the text dark and intricate, rather than to give a better, which might be afterwards uſed againſt them.

To give one inſtance for all: It is plain, that by making but two periods of the 2d, 3d, and 4th verſes of the 110th Pſalm, which is confeſſed on all hands to be prophetical of the Meſſiah's reign, they have ſo far murdered the ſenſe of it, that no verſion has been able to tranſlate it without ſome needleſs and unwarrantable ſuppletives; whereas had they divided it into three verſes, and placed the full ſtops where they ought to be, the ſenſe would have been clear, eaſy, and exactly agreeable to the prophecy contained in it. But perhaps that is what they carefully avoided. The reaſon of it will appear by what follows. And as no verſion has as yet rectified it, we ſhall take the liberty to ſubjoin the literal verſion of thoſe three verſes, according to their and our punctation, that our readers may ſee which ought to be preferred.

According to the Mazoretic.	According to our punctation.
2. The lord ſhall ſend the rod of thy power out of Sion; be thou ruler in the midſt of thine enemies.	2 The Lord ſhall ſend the rod of thy power out of Sion.
3. Thy free-will people, in the day of thy power, in the beauty of holineſs; from the womb of the morning is the dew of thy birth.	3. Rule thou in the midſt of thine enemies; thy free-will people in the beauty of holineſs. 4 From the womb of the morning is the dew of thy birth.

In the firſt of theſe the reader will ſee that the placing the full point after enemies, ſtrikes off the next words thy free-will people from being either the accuſative of the verb רדה radh, rule thou, going before, or from having any connexion with what comes after. So that thoſe words ſtand ſo ungrammatically there by themſelves, that to make ſenſe of the verſe, moſt verſions have been forced to make it the nominative of a verb which they have ſubſtituted to it of their own. Thus one of our verſions, that in our Common-Prayer-Book, words it thus; in the day of thy power ſhall the people offer thee free-will offerings, where the words ſhall offer are added to make up the ſenſe, and the order inverted, by placing the words, in the day of thy power, before them, contrary to the Hebrew. That in our Bible is ſtill wider from the original, tho' it knowledge of the ſacred books much eaſier and expeditious, than it could have been without it. Their other productions, tho' equally laborious, are of a more trifling nature; they excogitated a great variety of other points, ſome rhetorical, ſome muſical, and others critical; the former of which were deſigned to keep up the right cadence and chant of the Hebrew, and the latter to fix the ſenſe of ambiguous places in their own way; all which grew as various, numerous, and intricate as they were indeed uſeleſs, and in ſome caſes ridiculous. From theſe they ſet themſelves, about numbering the verſes, and even letters, and middle verſes of every book; and to ſet down how often every letter of the alphabet occurs in each book (E). And as the deſign of all this labour was to prevent

ſubſtitutes leſs, as the reader may ſee by comparing it with ours here, which is exactly literal and plain. According therefore to this pointing, the verſes in queſtion may be fairly commented as follows.

2. The Lord ſhall ſend the rod, or ſceptre, of thy power out of Sion, that is, out of the tribe of Judah. Compare Gen. xlix. 10. and Pſ lxxviii. 68. 3 Rule thou over thy free-will people (for none but ſuch are fit to be Chriſt's ſubjects; ſee Matth. xi. 29). In the midſt of thine enemies (Jews and Heathens, or, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, the world, the fleſh, and the devil). In the day of thy power (that is, when all power ſhall be given him, both in heaven and earth, Matth. xxviii 18) In the beauty of Holineſs (which is the peculiar characteriſtic of Chriſt's reign, and of his religion).

(E) Thus they obſerve, for inſtance, that Geneſis contains 1534 verſes, the middle of which is the 40th of the 27th chapter; and that the letter א Aleph occurs in that book 42,377 times; the ב Beth 38,218; and ſo of the reſt of the letters, and of every canonical book. The number of all the letters in the whole ſtands thus, according to them:

Final letters, ſtanding at the end of words	51,520
in the middle of words	160,734
Medial letters apart - - - - - - - - - - -	763,160
Total of medial and final - - - - - - - - - -	975,414

Whether theſe niceties were an improvment upon the Mohammedans, who likewiſe compute the number of verſes at the end of each ſection of their Koran, and ſum up the total at the end of it; or whether theſe did it in imitation of the Jews, we will not affirm; the former however ſeems the more likely of the two, from what Morinus and others have obſerved (38), that the firſt Jewiſh gram-

(38) Morin. ub. ſup. & al. quoq.

marians

vent any miſtakes, additions, omiſſions, or alterations creeping into the text; ſo it plainly intimates that they were conſcious of its having done ſo before; and that notwithſtanding all their pretended care and ſcrupulous exactneſs in tranſcribing them, they had not been able altogether to avoid ſome ſuch miſchances.

THE materials they wrote upon, as well as the inſtrument they wrote with, may, in ſome meaſure, be gathered from ſome places of ſcripture. As to the former it is plain, that their firſt writing, namely the Decalogue, was upon tables of ſtone. But it is likely, that Moſes made uſe of a leſs heavy and cumberſome material to write the reſt of his laws upon, ſuch as the Shittim, or ſome other hard wood. This way of writing upon tables was ſtill in uſe, not only in Iſaiah's days[c] (F), but even continued ſo till our Saviour's time[d]. But beſides theſe, we find frequent mention made in Job, the Pſalms and in the prophets, of their writing upon rolls[e], which are reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been made of ſkins, or of ſome pliable matter, fit to roll up or round, for ſo the original word imports (G). And we have the teſtimonies of Herodotus[f] and Diodorus Siculus[g], that the Ionians and Perſians uſed the ſkins of ſheep and goats to write upon, long enough before king Pergamus's time, who is rather therefore to be looked upon as an improver than the inventer of parchmarians were Arabians, and wrote their grammars in that tongue, ſome time after the points had been added to it; from which he concludes it probable, that they took both their points and rules of grammar from the Arabians; and if ſo, they might as well take their method of numbering the verſes, and improve it by extending it to the letters, and thoſe other niceties above-mentioned.

[c] Iſai. xxx 8. [d] Luke i. 63. [e] Job. xxxi. 35, 36. Pſ. xl. 7. Iſai. viii. 1. Jerem. xxxvi 4. Ezek. ii. 9. iii. 1. & ſeq. Zechar. v. 2. [f] Lib. 5. [g] Lib. 2.

(F) The ſeptuagint render this place, write it ἐπὶ πυξίου, upon a box table; which makes it probable that that wood had been in uſe before their time. And the Talmud tells us, that the lots of the two goats, which were ordered to be brought to the high prieſt on the day of expiation (39), were firſt written upon two ſmall box-tables †.

(G) מְגִלָּה Megilah comes from גָּלַל Gallal, which ſignifies to roll up, as volumen from volvo; anſwerable to which, the evangeliſt (40) makes uſe of the words ἀναπτύξας and πτυξας for the opening and ſhutting of the book.

(39) Levit. xvi. 8. † See before p. 205 note (V). (40) Luke iv. 17, 20.

ment

ment †. Theſe rolls differed in their ſize, according to the ſubject they contained, and the character in which it was written; ſo that ſome of them had ſeveral ſkins ſewed to one another lengthwiſe. The Jews retain them to this day in their ſynagogues. The lines were not continued through the whole length of the ſkin, much leſs of the roll, but were conveniently divided into columns. This is what is meant by what our verſion renders leaves, in that place of Jeremiah [h], where the king cut the roll in pieces, after they had read three or four pages of it (H). Of this ſort, we ſuppoſe, was alſo the book of the law, which the high-prieſt found in Joſiah's time [i].

HENCE we conclude, they uſed two ſorts of inſtruments; the firſt of ſteel, or ſome hard metal, for ingraving upon ſtone and wood; one ſide of which was ſharp-pointed, and the other blunt and ſmooth, and ſerved either to ſmooth or eraſe what had been written. Hence the Latin proverb invertere ſtylum. This kind of inſtrument we find mentioned in ſome places of ſcripture [k], though not deſcribed, but gueſſed at, from thoſe which were uſed by other nations. The other ſort was for writing upon the ſkins of beaſts; but how it was made, whether like our pens, pencils, or ſome other way, we cannot conjecture; only we read of a pen-knife, or, as the original has it, a ſcribe or writer's knife, with which king Jehoiakim cut the roll which was ſent him by Jeremiah.

Education and learning.

WE do not find, that they had any ſchools, or colleges, for the inſtruction of their youth, if we except thoſe of the prophets, which were of a different nature, as we ſhall ſhew by and by. They have not ſo much as a word to expreſs it (I): and if we conſider their manner of education and life, we † See Voss. orig. & lib. de grammat. cap. xxxviii. [h] Jerem. xxxvi. 23. [i] 2 Kings. xxii. 8. [k] Job xix. 24. Pſ. xlv. 2. & alib.

(H) The word is דלתות Dalloth, which properly ſignifies Doors; and here Pages or Columns, from their likeneſs to a door. A leaf of a book doth indeed bear the ſame reſemblance, but cannot properly belong to ſuch rolls as we are ſpeaking of.

(I) The Jews however to wipe off this imputation, have coined two names for theſe ſchools, of which there is no mention in the ſacred books, namely, the בת־מוסר, Beth-Muſſar, which ſignifies the houſe of inſtruction, or an inferior ſchool for reading and writing, and the בת־מדרש Beth-Middraſh, or houſe of enquiry or expounding, whith ertney went to be inſtructed in the weightier matters of religion, or rather in the rabbinic ſubtilities. But tho' it be viſible, that we ſhall find no great uſe for them. They bred up their ſons to bodily exerciſes, ſuch as would beſt fit them either for war or huſbandry; and their daughters to houſhold occupations, without troubling themſelves much about cultivating their that theſe are of more recent date, namely, after the Babyloniſh captivity, yet they affirm the former to have been kept by the tribe of Simeon, and the latter by that of Levi; which they infer from Jacob's prophecy of the diſperſion of thoſe two tribes in Iſrael (41). So that having no inheritance, they were obliged to keep ſchool for a livelihood (42). Agreeably to this abſurd notion (for it is plain that Simeon had a portion with the reſt (43),) they interpret the words of the pſalmiſt, paſſing through the valley of Baca, uſe it for a well; and the rain filleth the pool (44) of theſe wells of learning; and it was a common phraſe with them, Maſter, we come to drink waters from thy well, inſtead of, We come to be thy ſcholars or diſciples (45). And thus alſo the words in the next verſe, they go from ſtrength to ſtrength, they underſtood, of raiſing from one claſs to another. Theſe are, according to them, the מועדי־אל, Mohede-El, houſes of God; or, as our verſion more truly renders it, the ſynagogues, which the pſalmiſt ſaid were deſtroyed by the king of Babylon (46). So that upon the whole, we have not any grounds from ſcripture for any ſuch ſchools.

Much leſs for thoſe antediluvian academies, of which ſome chriſtian moderns make Adam the firſt founder, and which they pretend to have been continued by Seth, Enoch, Noah, Shem, Melchizedek, Abraham, and Jacob (47); the laſt of which, where it is ſaid, that he was a plain man, and dwelt in tents, the Chaldee paraphraſt, and after him other Jewiſh commentators, have rendered it, that he was a perfect man, and maſter of the Beth-Muſſar, or, in plain Engliſh, an excellent ſchool-maſter. Of Abraham we have ſeen heretofore, that he is affirmed by Joſephus and others to have taught aſtronomy in Egypt *; and Melchizedek is likewiſe ſuppoſed by the ſame authors, to have kept a famous ſchool at Hebron, called from thence Kiriath-ſepher, which may be properly rendered, the city of books, or learning; and Debir, oracle. Some others think, that it flouriſhed about 1456 years before Chriſt, that is, about Joſhua's time; and that it had been founded by the Canaanites, and was the moſt antient academy in the world; after whoſe model that famous one of the Edomites, called Theman, and that of Tekoah, had been formed. Some add, that it had a public library, in their minds, farther than to inſtruct them in the knowledge of their religion and laws; and this was the province of the parents, chiefly on the ſabbath. They had rather an averſion than curioſity for foreign languages, and he that could ſpeak and write his own well, or at leaſt as well as his neighbours, thought himſelf ſufficiently learned; and for theſe cuſtom ſerved them inſtead of grammar. Hiſtory, farther than they found it in their ſacred books, they thought beneath their care, becauſe they found in theſe all that they eſteemed worth knowing. The creation of the world, the flood, the origin and diſperſion of nations, and, what concerned them moſt, their own hiſtory and deſcent from Abraham, their affinity to other branches of his poſterity, the Egyptian bondage and deliverance; and, in a word, all that wonderful ſeries of tranſactions which had happened to their nation; in all which God had ſhewed ſuch peculiar regard to them, that it is no wonder if we find them ſo full of themſelves, and ſo prone to deſpiſe all the reſt of the world. Beſides the Pentateuch, and the hiſtories of Joſhua, of their judges, and kings, which they thought themſelves obliged to be verſed in, they had alſo ſeveral others, which have been loſt ſince; ſuch as the book of the wars of the Lord, that of Jaſher, and eſpecially the book of the Kings, and the Chronicles of the kings of Judah and Iſrael, to which thoſe we have extant continually refer (K): but theſe laſt were not perhaps ſo univerſally ſtudied, but fell only to the lot of princes and politicians.

(41) Gen. xlix. 7. (42) Targ. Hieroſol. Rab. Raſch. Sal. Jarch. & al. in Gen. xlix. 7. (43) Vid. Joſh. xix. 1. & Vol. II p. 440, not. (F). (44) Pſ. lxxxiv. 6. (45) Vid. Gemar. in חגיגה, fol 3. & Middraſh in Pſ. lxxiv 8. (46) Pſ. lxxiv. 8. Vid. Middr. in loc. (47) Vid Boulduc. Eccleſ ant. leg. Sanders vindic. Bibl. Batnag. & al. * See Vol. II. p. 383, not (Q).

which

All

which were preſerved the records and hiſtory of the world, continued from the flood downwards †. All which is built, at the beſt, upon very uncertain conjectures.

(K) It cannot be reaſonably ſuppoſed, that the Chronicles and the book of Kings do refer to one another, whenever we meet with theſe words at the end of every reign. The reſt of the acts of— and ſo on, are they not written in the book of, &c. ſeeing the ſame facts are repeated all the way in both, with little or no variation or addition, and very often in the ſame words. The Greek verſion has indeed given the book of Chronicles the name of παραλειπόμενοι, or things omitted, but with relation to hiſtorical facts, the reader will find but a ſmall number in this, that are not in that of the Kings: It ſeems therefore to have been called ſo from its having given a full chronology of the Scripture from Adam, and carried it beyond that of the Kings, as St. Jerom juſtly obſerves (48). To which may be added, that it ſets forth the order of the genealogies, tribes, and families, the offices and courſes of the prieſts and Levites, and ma-

† Milenddorp Driedo Ar. Montan. Maſius ap. St. Philip. Ho-nac. Hebr. jab Othoniel. (48) Epiſt. ad Damian.

ny

ALL that related to religion and morality was contained in the Moſaic books, and interſperſed in the others; but be-ny other particularities, which give a great light to the reſt of the ſacred writings, and without which it would be ridiculous for a man to pretend to underſtand them, as the ſame father elſewhere expreſſes it (49).

The books therefore referred to in theſe ſeem to be, either the records out of which they were taken by their compilers, or, which is indeed more probable, the annals and archives of every king's reign, to which the readers were ſent for a farther account; whilſt theſe, being writen by inſpired pen-men, were deſigned to contain only ſuch tranſactions, as had an immediate relation to religion.

If it be aſked, who were the authors of thoſe books, it is plain that the former were written by the hiſtorians or recorders of every reign, who were appointed to that office by the kings themſelves. But who were the writers of the latter, is not ſo eaſily agreed: For as, on the one hand, the hiſtorians mentioning every tranſaction as done in their time, has induced many of the learned to ſuppoſe, that they were written at ſeveral times, and by ſeveral inſpired pen-men, cotemporary with them, ſuch as Samuel, Gad, Nathan, Iſaiah, Jeremiah, and others; ſo, on the other ſide, the ſeeming uniformity of ſtyle through all thoſe books, makes that notion ſeem very improbable, and ſeveral expreſſions interſperſed in them impoſſible. Thus it is ſaid, in the beginning of the book of Samuel, that the word of God was precious, or ſcarce, in thoſe days (50); and that it was then the cuſtom to call a prophet a ſeer, and to enquire for him by that name (51). Theſe and ſeveral others in the ſame ſtyle ſeem at leaſt to intimate, that it was otherwiſe when the books were written. Thus it is alſo ſaid in another place of the ſame book, that in the author's time, the name of Beth-el, or houſe of God, was turned into that of Beth-aven, or the houſe of wickedneſs; which did not happen till after Jeroboam's revolt (52). Theſe, and many more which we omit, make it very probable, that they were not written by cotemporary authors.

To reconcile theſe it is generally believed, that the original authors of them were thoſe inſpired perſons above-mentioned, who committed them to writing as they happened; but that all thoſe pieces were afterwards collected into a regular hiſtory, either by Ezra, Haggai, or ſome of theſe prophets who returned from the captivity; and who, being alike inſpired, might make ſuch further additions as they thought proper to illuſtrate their hiſtory, ſuch as the change of names, cuſtoms, and the like, without derogating from their authority. Accordingly we find, that they have been ſtill conſtantly acknowledged by the Jews, to be of divine authority, and have been appealed to, as ſuch, by the writers of the goſpel (53).

(49) Id. ad Paulin. (50) 1 Sam. iii. 1. (51) Ibid. ix. 9. (52) Ibid. xiii. 2, 5. (53) Vid. Matth. xxii. 3. & al. Luke iv. 25, & ſeq. & alib. paſſ.

ſides theſe they had the Pſalms, the Proverbs, and Eccleſiaſtes, beſides many other writings of Solomon, a great part of which are likewiſe loſt; to ſay nothing of Job and the Prophets. All theſe they were to be inſtructed in, even from their infancy, they heard them expounded on the ſabbath and other feſtivals, by the Prophets and Levites, and in them they found ſuch a dreadful account of the theology of other nations, that we cannot ſuppoſe them to have had the leaſt curioſity to know more of it. And indeed their law-giver knew but too well, how dangerous ſuch knowledge would have been to a people ſo eaſy to be corrupted, and therefore wiſely ordained, that their children ſhould be inſtructed only in ſuch truths, as were proper to inſpire them with an awful regard to God and his laws, and with the love of virtue; whilſt he forbad them, almoſt upon all occaſions, to be inquiſitive after the religion and learning of other nations.

THIS was moſt probably alſo the foundation of that extraordinary diſregard they ſhewed for thoſe uſeful arts and ſciences, in which their neighbours had ſo long excelled. Arithmetic, being ſo neceſſary for the trading part, might indeed find ſome encouragement amongſt them, and even this we offer more as a probable conjecture than from any teſtimony; but as for navigation, aſtronomy, and ſuch like, we find nothing in their hiſtory, but what aſſures us of their unſkilfulneſs in them. The maritime tribes contented themſelves with receiving foreign merchants into their harbours, without endeavouring to carry on their commerce abroad; inſomuch, that when Solomon reſolved to ſend ſome ſhips into foreign countries, he was forced to have them manned with foreign ſailors. And as for aſtronomy, we need but call to mind what has been ſaid, under another head, of the poor ſhifts they were drove to, to find out their new moons *, to convince us of their profound ignorance of it. We ſhall only add, that they were ſo far from knowing any thing of eclipſes, that they have not ſo much as one upon record, or indeed a name for it. They probably looked upon them as miraculous, and as tokens of the divine anger, and ſo never dived farther into the nature of them. Perhaps alſo they were led into this notion, by that figurative expreſſion in Job [l], he covers the light with his hands, and ſets, as it were, an interpoſer over it; for that is the literal ſenſe of the original, and of the verſion of the ſeptuagint: agreeable to which is that awful deſcription of the day of the Lord in Joel [m], and of the down-

* See before, p. 186. note (H). [l] Job. xxxvi. 32. [m] Ch. ii. 10 & 31. iii. 15.

fal-

fal of Egypt and other nations, which we meet with in the Prophets.

THE changing of the ſolar into the lunar year, and the complete month of thirty days into the irregular moons of twenty nine and thirty days, mentioned under other heads; the diſtinguiſhing of the days of the week (not by the ſeven planets, of which they do not ſeem to have had any knowledge, or ſo much as names for; but to have ranked them, the two great luminaries excepted, among the fixed ſtars; but) by firſt, ſecond, third day, or firſt and ſecond from the ſabbath; the diviſion of the day and night not into 12 equal parts, as the Egyptians are thought to have done long before, but the day into four parts, and the night into four watches. Theſe diviſions of time, ſo very oppoſite to that more perfect one of the Egyptians and other neighbouring nations, ſeem entirely calculated by their law-giver, to prevent their applying themſelves to the ſtudy of aſtronomy, and thence falling inſenſibly into that of aſtrology, and being thereby inſnared into the worſhip of thoſe heavenly bodies, after the example of other nations (L). What inſtruments they had to reckon the time by, whether the Egyptian Clepſydra, or water-glaſſes, or ſun-dials, or any other, we cannot affirm, except that we read of the ſun-dial, or, as the original ſignifies, the ſtair-caſe, or flight of ſteps of Ahaz [n]; but allowing it to have been a real and regular ſun-dial it may eaſily be ſuppoſed to have been rather Measuring of time.

[n] 2 Kings xx. 9, & ſeq.

(L) It is no difficult matter to conceive how thoſe antient nations came to worſhip the planets and heavenly bodies, after they had once imbibed the belief of their having ſo conſiderable a ſhare in the government of all ſublunary things, and had aſcribed to every one their ſeveral influences, good or bad, and the particular periods in which they ruled by turns. But how this notion came firſt into their head, is not ſo eaſy to imagine; and yet that it muſt have begun very early, and was univerſally received by all the heathen world, will plainly appear, if we conſider how antient the diviſion of the day and night into twenty four hours is; and that the conſecrating every day of the week to one of the ſeven planets (not in the regular order in which they ſtand in their ſyſtem, ♄, ♃, ♂, ☉, &c. but by ſkipping two of them every new day,) could not be owing to any thing but an opinion, that every planet ruled alternately the ſeveral hours of each day.

Thus on Saturday, Saturn, the planet of that day, being ſuppoſed to govern the 1, 8, 15, and 22 hours, whilſt Jupiter, the next in order, governed the 2, 9, 16, and 23, Mars the 3, 10, 17, and 24, the Sun muſt of courſe govern the firſt hour of the next day, upon which account he became the planet of that day.

ther the work of ſome foreign aſtronomer, than a common thing among them; that prince's character ſufficiently ſhews, that he was not over ſcrupulous of introducing new things of a much more dangerous nature, witneſs his new altar from Damaſcus.

and having ruled the 1, 8, 15, and 22, and Venus and Mercury the two remaining ones, brought in the Moon to be lady of the next, or of Monday; and ſo of the reſt, according to the following diagram:

Thus then it is plain, that this planetary diviſion of the week was of aſtrological extraction; and that that of the days into twenty four parts was ſo likewiſe, though not equally demonſtrable, can hardly be queſtioned, if we conſider the great connection which theſe two have to one another; and that the reputed author of this laſt, the Egyptian Hermes ſurnamed Triſmegiſtus, and cotemporary with Moſes, if not the ſame perſon with him, was a great aſtrologer, as it appears by ſome of his writings on that ſubject ſtill extant under his name.

Some authors do indeed tell us, that he took the hint of this diviſion from the Egyptian Cunocephalus, which he obſerved, at the time of the equinox, to have piſſed and howled twelve times from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſet, and at equal diſtance, from which the Egyptians took alſo the hint of the Clepſydra, or water hour-glaſſes, in memory of which, they uſed to place the image of that animal on the top of them (54). But as we cannot look upon the whole ſtory to be authentic, ſo the moſt that can be made of it is, that that nation hath the faireſt claim for being the inventers of this diviſion;

(54) Tull. ap. Victorin. cited by Macrob. lib. i. c. 21. Vid. Kerch. Hierogliph. & al.

though

maſcus o. Beſides, as they divided the day into four parts, the two firſt of which were from the ſun-riſing to its meridian, and the two laſt from noon to its ſetting, it was not difficult for them to make out the other diviſion by ſuch obſervations, either on his career, or on the ſhadow of any trees, houſes, or even of their own bodies, as every ploughman with us is able to do to a much greater juſtneſs. The ſame might be done in the diviſion of the four night-watches from the motion of the ſtars. To ſeek for other ſciences, or for ſchools or univerſities among them, were like ſeeking them among the Goths and Vandals; they not only had an equal contempt for them and for thoſe nations that cultivated them, but looked upon them as dangerous and unlawful. Their zeal, or rather hatred, againſt them was ſo far from abating, after their return from Babylon, where they had ſeen them flouriſh, that it rather grew into a kind of fury, inſomuch that their large chronic, intitled Juchaſin, hath recorded a ſentence of anathema, which paſſed in the time of Hircanus and Ariſtobulus, againſt ſuch as ſhould ſuffer their children to be inſtructed in any part of the Greek learning. Solomon indeed, we are told, was an excellent naturaliſt, and wrote a great deal upon that ſubject; but he was ſo far from recommending that ſtudy to others, that he calls his reſearches of that kind vanity and vexation of ſpirit, or, as the original imports, a feeding upon the wind [p]: which is probably the reaſon, why, inſtead of following his example, they ſuffered all thoſe excellent writings to be loſt. Whilſt they were thus averſe to the learning of other nations, they were no leſs ſcrupulous of concealing their own from them, eſpecially their ſacred books; witneſs the grief they expreſſed, when Ptolemy obtained a verſion of them into Greek, in memory of which they have kept a ſtrict, even a double faſt, on the eighth and ninth days of the month Thewet, or December.

ON the other hand they were no leſs careful to cultivate the knowledge of them among themſelves: we cannot indeed Synagogue.

o Ibid xvi. 10, & ſeq. p Eccleſ. i. & ſeq. paſſ.

though whether they or the Chaldeans were ſo, the Jews never admitted of it till after the captivity; for the firſt mention that we find of hours, properly ſo called, is in the apocryphal book of Judith; ſo that, in all reſpects, their computation of time was different from the reſt of the world. Even their very ſeaſons are not called by the uſual names of ſpring and autumn, but of ſeed-time and harveſt, cold and heat, winter and ſummer (55).

(55) Vid. Gen. viii. ver. ult. & alib. paſſ. Vid. & Whiſt. Theory.

be

be ſure that they had any ſynagogues before the captivity, though it be far from improbable, conſidering the great diſtance at which ſome of them lived from the temple, and that at beſt they were obliged to reſort thither but thrice in a year; but other places they had for prayer and inſtruction, namely, the ſchools of the prophets, to which they might repair on the ſabbaths, new moons, and other feſtivals [q]. By prophets we mean not thoſe ſtrictly ſo called, men endued with a ſpirit of prophecy (M), but their diſciples, or, as the Hebrew idiom words it, the ſons of the prophets. The former were generally conſulted by the kings, prieſts, and elders of the people upon all extraordinary occaſions, whether about religion or ſtate affairs [r], and the latter were brought up under them, and fitted for inſtructing the people, in the way of virtue and the worſhip of God.

Schools.

Prophets. THESE had their habitations chiefly in the country, they lived in a kind of ſociety among themſelves, and had generally one or more of the prophets to be heads over them, and to whom they gave the title of father [s]. Their houſes were but mean, and of their own building [t]. Their food was chiefly pottage made of herbs [u]; unleſs when the people ſent ſome better fare to them, ſuch as bread, parched corn, honey, [q] Vid. 2 King. iv. 23. [r] Vid. 1 King xxii. 5, 7. 2 King. xix. 2. 20, & ſeq. Jerem. xxxvii. 3, & ſeq. Ezek. xiv. 1, & ſeq. & alib. [s] 1 Sam. ix. 6. 2 King. vi. 1, & ſeq. [t] Ibid. ver. 2, 3, & 4. [u] Ibid. iv. 38, & ſeq.

(M) The word prophet doth not always ſignify an inſpired perſon in the old teſtament, but often a preacher of righteouſneſs, ſuch as were all the patriarchs from Seth, or, in the ſenſe of the goſpel, ſuch as believed and taught the coming of the Meſſiah (56); in which ſenſe alſo thoſe that preached him and his doctrine after his coming, are alſo called prophets, and their preaching prophecy (57). The ſame may be alſo ſaid of thoſe who ſang the praiſes of God, or accompanied them with ſome muſical inſtrument, as Miriam (58), the company of prophets that met Saul (59), and the ſons of Aſaph, of Heman, and Jeduthun, who are ſaid to have propheſied with harps, pſalteries, and cymbals (60); tho' they were properly no other than muſicians. The apoſtle gives the title of prophet, even to the heathen poets (61); and hence comes that diſtinction in St. Auſtin of Jewiſh, Chriſtian, and Heathen prophets (62).

(56) Luke i. 70. (57) Vid. 1 Cor. xi. 4. xiv. 24, 29, & ſeq. & alib. (58) Exod. xv. 20. (59) 1 Sam. x. 5. (60) 1 Chron. xxv. 1. (61) Tit. i. 12. (62) Præfat. in lib xix. cont. Fauſt.

dried

dried fruits, and the like [x]. Their dreſs was plain and coarſe, and tied about with a leathern girdle [y]; their wants being ſo few were eaſily ſupplied by their own hands, and as their views reached no farther, ſo they limited their labour to that, that they might beſtow the more time in prayer, ſtudy, and retirement. Riches were no temptation to them in ſuch a ſtate, and therefore Eliſha not only refuſed Naaman's preſents, but puniſhed Gehazi in a ſevere manner, for having clandeſtinely obtained a ſmall portion of them [z]. This laborious, recluſe and abſtemious courſe of life, joined to the meaneſs of dreſs, gave them ſuch a ſtrange air, eſpecially among the courtiers, that they looked upon them as no better than madmen [a]. Their extraordinary freedom in reproving even princes for their wicked deeds, did likewiſe expoſe them frequently to perſecutions, impriſonments, and ſometimes to death; eſpecially in the reigns of ſome wicked princes, ſuch as were Ahab and Manaſſeh; but in the main, they were always reſpected by the better and wiſer ſort, even of the higheſt rank, and uſed with the utmoſt reverence and regard both in language and behaviour [b].

THIS is all that we know concerning thoſe religious communities and their manner of life: thoſe who have ventured to give us a further account of it, ſuch as their living in perpetual celibacy, poverty, obedience, and the like, have ſpun it out of their own brain [c]. It is true, that we do not read of any women living amongſt them, and that when the Shunammite went to acquaint Eliſha with the death of her ſon, he ſent Gehazi to meet her, and that when ſhe would have fallen down at his maſter's feet, he offered to hinder her; but it is alſo certain, that ſeveral of the prophets were married, and had children, as Samuel, Iſaiah, whoſe wife is called a propheteſs [d], Ezekiel [e], and Hoſea [f], and it was the widow of one of the ſons of the prophets, whoſe oil Eliſha did miraculouſly multiply, to ſave her ſons from being ſold to the creditors of the deceaſed [g]. The propheteſſes were likewiſe married, Deborah was the wife of Lapidoth [h], and Huldah, whom king Joſiah ſent to conſult, was the wife of Shallum, and ſhe is obſerved (in the text) to have lived in the college of Jeruſalem [i]. Theſe

[x] 1 King. xiv. 3, & ſeq. 2 King. iv. 42, & alib. [y] Vid. Zech. xiii. 4. 2 King. i. 8. [z] 2 King. v. paſſ. [a] Ibid. ii. 23. ix. 11. [b] 1 King. xviii. 7, & ſeq. 2 King. i. 13. xiii. 14, & alib. [c] Vid. int. al. BEAUBE. Eccl. ant. leg. CALM. ſub. voc. prophet. [d] Iſai. viii. 3. [e] Ezek. xxiv. 18. [f] Hoſ. i. 2, & ſeq. [g] 2 King. iv. 1, & ſeq. [h] Judg. iv. 4. [i] 2 King. xxii. 14, 15.

inſpired

inſpired perſons, whilſt they continued in Iſrael, which was till the return from Babylon, being the ſureſt expounders of the Moſaic law, proved ſuch a ſtrong fence againſt ſchiſm and hereſy, (that political one of Jeroboam excepted, againſt which they waged a continual war) that it could never get footing among them (N); whereas prophecy no ſooner ceaſed, than they ſplit themſelves into ſuch a great variety of ſects, and gave ſuch a ſcope to their fertile fancies, that the Talmudiſts own, Elias himſelf would be at a loſs to ſolve the ſubtile difficulties which they have raiſed againſt each other [k].

[k] Tract. Megillath.

(N) We muſt not however paſs by a diſtinction, which the antient Jews have hammered out of the ſacred writings, between the חסידים Haſſidim, called by the Greek and Latin writers Aſſidei †, the צדקים Tzadikim, and רשעים Reſhabim. The words properly ſignify no more than merciful, juſt, and wicked men; and the aſſembly or company of the two former is often oppoſed to that of the latter, not as being different ſects, but as perſons of a different character. But the Talmudiſts have attributed ſome peculiar opinions to each of theſe, though they are not quite agreed, whether they related to ſpeculation or practice. They give the preference to the Haſſidim in both reſpects, as being the honeſteſt interpreters and practicers of the law, and the Phariſees boaſt themſelves ſprung from them; though much more likely from the Tzadikim, which were an over-ſtrict and ſcrupulous ſect, pretending much to works of ſupererogation, to whom it is thought the advice of Solomon was directed, be not righteous over-much (63). Theſe however are the tenets attributed to each of them with reſpect to meum and tuum (64). The Haſſidim ſaid, what is mine is yours; the Reſhabim, what is yours is mine; but the Tzadikim, what is mine is mine, and what is yours is yours. To this the apoſtle ſeems to allude, when he ſays (65), that ſcarcely for a righteous man will one die, yet peradventure for a good man ſome would even dare to die, whilſt Chriſt vouchſafed to die, even for the worſt of the three, even for the wicked; where the δίκαιος alludes to the Tzadik, or rigidly righteous, and ἀγαθὸς to the Haſſid, or merciful man, as the wicked to the Reſhabim. Whether that diſtinction likewiſe of our Saviour (66), between the good and the bad, the juſt and unjuſt, hath not probably an eye to this threefold ſort of men, we leave to the reader.

† Vid. 1 Maccab. vii. 13. (63) Eccleſ. vii. 16. (64) Vid. D. Kimchi. in Pſ. ciii. 17. Bartenor. gloſſ. in pirke abb. c. ii. 8. v. 10. Wagenſch. ad lib. סוטה c. ix. 15. (65) Rom. v. 7, 8. (66) Matt. v. 45.

THEIR

THESE prophets, the Talmudiſts reckon from Abraham to Malachi, to the number of forty eight, and ſix propheteſſes (O). Several of the former are known to us by nothing

(O) The propheteſſes are Miriam, Deborah, Hannah, (Samuel's mother) Abigail, Huldah, and Eſther; ſome add the two Egyptian midwives to that number. As for the prophets, they are Abraham, Iſaac, Jacob, Moſes, Aaron, Joſhua, Phinehas, Elkanah and his ſon Samuel, Eli, Nathan, Gad, Iddo, David, Solomon, Micaiah the ſon of Imlah (67), Obadiah, Ahijah the Shilonite (68), Jehu the ſon of Hanani (69), Azariah the ſon of Oded (70), Ahaziel the ſon of Mathaniah, Eliezer the ſon of Dodavah (71), Hoſea, Amos, Micah, Amos II. ſuppoſed the father of Iſaiah, Elijah, Eliſha, Iſaiah, Jonah, Nahum, Joel, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Urijah the ſon of Shemaiah (72), Ezekiel, Daniel, Baruch, Neriah, Seraiah his ſon, Maaſeiah his father (73), Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Mordecai, Shallum the huſband of Huldah, and Hanameel, Jeremiah's kinſman, of whom he bought a field (74).

Some add, that when the father of any prophet is mentioned, he is alſo a prophet (75); as where Jeremiah is ſaid to be the ſon of Hilkiah, Hoſea the ſon of Beeri (76), &c. and that when the place of his nativity is not mentioned, he is ſuppoſed to have been of Jeruſalem (77).

It is obſerveable, with reſpect to Daniel, that though the Jews allow him a rank among the other prophets, yet they will not admit his writings among thoſe of the other prophets, but only among the Hagiographa, which they look upon as of the leaſt authority of all the canonical books. The reaſons they give for it, are 1. That Daniel was a courtier, and ſpent his life in luxury and grandeur, in the ſervice of an uncircumciſed king. 2. That the ſpirit of prophecy was confined to the land of Canaan, out of which he lived all his life: to theſe ſome have added a third, namely, that he had been made an eunuch, according to Iſaiah's prophecy to Hezekiah (78), and that ſuch were excluded from entering into the congregation of the Lord (79). Some learned Jews have indeed vindicated him from this laſt imputation (80), but their Gemarrah doth caſt ſtill a much more injurious reflection upon him, namely, that he ſtole away privately into Egypt to buy hogs, whilſt Nebuchadnezzar was ſetting up his golden image, and his three friends Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abednego, were condemned to the thing but their names; as for the reſt of them, we ſhall refer the farther account of their actions, writings, and character, till we come to the hiſtory of thoſe kings in whoſe reigns they lived, and with which they have an immediate relation. The ways by which God revealed himſelf to them were various; to ſome he appeared and ſpoke, either in a human or ſome other viſible form, as he did to Abraham and Moſes; to others by voice only, as to Samuel, Jeremiah, Hoſea, and others [l]; ſometimes by viſions, as he did to Iſaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and others [m]: at other times by dreams [n]; but the moſt uſual and general way was by the ſole operation of the ſpirit of God, acting on the mind of the prophet. In this laſt manner, the book of Pſalms is generally thought to have been dictated by the Holy Ghoſt to the author, or rather the authors of it, Moſes, David, Solomon, the three ſons of Chore, Aſaph, and the reſt [o].

(67) 1 King. xxii. 8, & ſeq. (68) Ibid. xi 29. (69) Ibid. xvi. 1. (70) 2 Chron. xx 1. (71) Ibid. xx. ult. (72) Jerem. xxxii. 20, & ſeq. (73) Ibid. li. 59. (74) Ibid. xxxii. 7, & ſeq. de his prophet. vid. Seder olam zuter. (75) Vid Kimch. in Hoſ. i. (76) Jer. & Hoſ. i. 1. (77) Kimch ibid. (78) 2 King. xx. 18. (79) Deut. xxiii. 1. (80) Vid. Abenezr in Dan.

SECT. VI.

The JEWISH CHRONOLOGY, from Abraham's vocation to the Babyloniſh Captivity.

WE have ſhewn, in a former ſection, that the time which elapſed from Abraham's firſt entrance into Canaan, to Jacob's deſcent into Egypt, was 215 years †, and that his poſterity continued in the latter, another 215 years *, in all 430. From their coming out of [l] 1 Sam. iii. 4, & ſeq. Jerem. i. 4, & ſeq. & alib. Hoſ. i. 2. [m] Iſai. vi. 1, & ſeq. Ezek. i. 4, & ſeq. Dan. vii. 1, & ſeq. [n] Dan. ii. 19. Mat. i. 20, & al. Act. xvi 9. [o] Vid. HIERON. præfat. in pſalm. † Comp. the years in the margin, in Vol. II. p. 358. note (E). * Ibid. p. 363. note (K).

ſtames for refuſing to worſhip it (81). But it is plain, that all this rancour ſprings from the great uſe, which the Chriſtians have ſince made of his writings againſt them, in ſpite of the noble character which Ezekiel gives him, when he mentions him with Noah and Job (82). Even Joſephus, though he allows him to have been a complete politician, is ſo far from denying him the title of prophet, that he doth even give him the preference to the reſt, in ſeveral reſpects (83). But the reſt of the Jews have thrown his prophecies into the ספר כתובים Sepher Kethubim, among thoſe of Job, Proverbs, Eccleſiaſtes, &c. (84).

(81) Tractat. Sanhedr. (82) Ezek. xiv. & paſſ. (83) Ant. l. x. c. 12. (84) Vide Hieron. præfat. in Iſai. Maimon. More Nevoch. pt. 2. Grot. præfat. in Iſai. Munſt. Bund. & al.

that

that bondage to Solomon's laying the foundation of the temple, the text tells us, was 480 years [a]; from thence to the deſtruction of it by Nebuchadnezzar, when Judah was carried into captivity, are reckoned 422 years [b]: ſo that the whole time of this epoch, from the vocation of Abraham to the Babyloniſh captivity, amounts to 1332. As to the kingdom of Iſrael, it laſted only 254 years from its defection from that of Judah, in the 37th year after the building of the temple, to their being carried away captive by Shalmaneſer; which happened 134 years before the Babyloniſh captivity.

THUS far then the larger diviſions of this æra are fixed upon a ſolid ground, the authority of the ſacred writers; but leſt our readers ſhould think it equally eaſy to adjuſt the ſmaller periods, eſpecially thoſe which relate to the ſeveral reigns of their judges and kings; or ſhould think it impoſſible to err in them, becauſe the length of each is tranſmitted to us by inſpired writers, from whom it would be impious to diſſent; we beg leave to remind them, before we give a liſt of thoſe monarchs, of what has been obſerved in the preamble prefixed to the firſt volume of this work, concerning the vaſt, and almoſt irreconcileable, difference there is between the Hebrew and Samaritan chronology, as well as between theſe two and that of the ſeptuagint; to ſay nothing of Joſephus and other Jewiſh writers. We did alſo give our reaſons there, for preferring the Samaritan, as far as it went, to all the reſt, even to the Hebrew, which laſt is juſtly ſuppoſed to have been corrupted by the Jews, and mutilated by the careleſsneſs of copyiſts. We have given a pregnant proof of the latter in another ſection ‡, and ſhall ſoon have occaſion to ſay ſomething further of the former.

But theſe are not the only cauſes of the difficulty one finds in ſettling the Jewiſh chronology, we beg leave to add a few others equally conſiderable; and theſe are, 1. That the ſacred writers affected to uſe round numbers in their large computations, without minding too ſcrupulouſly the odd years that fell over or under them. 2. The ſame they did in their leſſer reckonings; thoſe, for inſtance, of their kings reigns, which they computed by complete years, and overlooked the odd months, which the firſt and laſt happened to fall ſhort of; by which it often happened, that a whole year was gained within the compaſs of two or three reigns, or of forty or fifty years. 3. The book of Judges, whoever was the author of it (P), compared with Josephus's history of them, seems only a short account of so many persons, and of their government,

[a] 1 King. vi. 1. [b] See the marginal chronol. of our Bibles, and USHER's ann. p. 31. ‡ See Vol. II. p. 355. not (B).

(P) It is plain, that it was not begun and continued by several hands, under the government of each judge, as some have imagined; not only from the uniformity of style throughout, but also because the author of it, whoever he was, gives a kind of epitome of the whole book at the beginning (85); and the expression which often occurs in it, that in those days there was no king in Israel (86) shews it to have been written after the beginning of their monarchy. On the other hand, those who date it after the captivity, because it is said there (87), that Jonathan and his sons continued to be priests until the day of the captivity of the land, which they think must at least be that of Tiglath-pileser, (88) seem to post-date it prodigiously, not considering, that by what the author says at the beginning (89), that the children of Benjamin dwell with the Jebusites in Jerusalem, unto this day, he must have lived before these were driven out of it by David. It is therefore more probable, as the Jews think that the captivity here spoken of, was the battle which the Israelites lost against the Philistines, when the ark was taken by them; at which time, one may reasonably suppose a great number of the people were also taken captive.

What makes this conjecture still more probable is, that in the very next verse to that where the captivity is mentioned, the author adds, that the Danites set up Micha's ephod all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh, which was only till they fetched the ark from thence, to carry it against the Philistines; and this was about the beginning of Samuel's time; for after its return it was not carried back to Shiloh, but to Kirjath-jearim (90). If the ephod then continued no longer in Dan, there was no farther need of keeping any priests to sacrifice unto it. Neither indeed is it credible, that such a notorious piece of idolatry could have continued under Samuel's government, when it is expresly said, that he made the children of Israel put away their strange gods to serve the Lord alone (91).

It seems therefore very probable to us, that a mistake has been committed in the last word of that 30th verse, from the likeness of the final letters; and that instead of גלות הארץ the captivity of the land, it was originally written גלות הארון the captivity of the ark. From all which it will follow, that Samuel lived at the time of this book's being written; and consequently, that he is most likely to have been the author of it. Neither will the supposition of a much later captivity destroy this conjecture,

(85) Ch. ii. 10, & seq. (86) Ch. xvii. 6 xviii. 1. xix. 1, & alib. (87) Judg. xviii. 30. (88) See 2 King. xv. 29. (89) Ch. i. ver. 21. (90) Conf. 1 Sam. iv. 4, & vii. 1, 2. (91) Ibid. ver. 3, 4.

ment, without regard to the interregnums and anarchies, which happened between any of them. It ſeems indeed as if they were deſignedly paſſed by, as dead epochas not worth recording. But laſtly, and to mention no more, after the diviſion of the two kingdoms, the length of every king's reign ſeems indeed exactly ſet down, and the ſynchroniſms between thoſe of Judah and Iſrael exactly obſerved; and yet there often happens ſuch jarring and diſagreement between them, as cannot be reconciled by any other way, than by ſuppoſing that ſome of thoſe monarchs, in either kingdom, were taken into copartnerſhip with their predeceſſors, and that the beginning of their reigns was dated from that time, and not from that of their father's death. The neceſſity of this ſuppoſition cannot but be obvious to thoſe who are converſant with chronological works, eſpecially thoſe of the learned Uſher. How far the Jewiſh computation by lunar years, their ignorance of aſtronomy, and want of exact tables, of which we have lately had occaſion to ſpeak under another head, may have increaſed theſe difficulties, we need not ſay. But theſe and many more we willingly omit, have induced a great number of learned chronologers, antient and modern, ſuch as St. Jerom, Scaliger, Voſſius, Genebrard, and others, to think it next to impoſſible to adjuſt the Jewiſh chronology by thoſe few books we have extant, and which are but epitomes of more full and comprehenſive hiſtories long ſince loſt.

WE need not tell our readers, that the hiſtories of ſeveral kings are ſaid in the text to have been written by contemporary prophets, of whom we have nothing extant but their names; and that the books of Kings and Chronicles conclude every king's reign in words to this effect: Now the reſt of the acts of ſuch a king, his valour and conqueſt, and the like, are they not written in the book of the kings (or Chronicles) of the kings of Judah (or Iſrael). Now it were abſurd to ſuppoſe, that thoſe we have extant under the name of Kings and Chronicles, do refer to one another, ſeeing, ſome few inconſiderable particulars excepted, they all mention the ſame things, and almoſt word for word; and are alike regardleſs of all the other particulars of thoſe reigns. It is therefore more reſonable to ſuppoſe, that they referred the readers to more exact and voluminous annals or hiſtories, written by proper perſons in every reign, and which either periſhed during the captivity, or ſince. But whether we aſcribe the diſture, if we ſuppoſe that Ezra, or any of the inſpired writers that returned from that of Babylon, might add this circumſtance, as we have made it probable already, they did many others to the hiſtorical books, by way of illuſtration.

ficulties

ficulties of the Jewish chronology to the loss of these books, to the Jews corrupting of the text, or to the carelessness of transcribers; any or all of these will sufficiently account for the different ways, by which almost every chronologer has endeavoured to fix the various æras before the birth of Christ; concerning which we shall refer our readers to our preface above mentioned, and to the tables thereto annexed.

THE Jews indeed, whether antient or modern, do not differ so widely from one another in this respect as the Christians do; but then it is plain, from the tables abovementioned, that they have shortned, one and all, the space between the creation of the world, and the birth of Christ, by 240 years, little more or less, of the vulgar æra. Whether therefore this was wilfully done, and with design to explode the completion of the prophecies concerning the time of the Messiah's coming, which is but too likely, seeing their chronology from that time to this, doth exactly agree with ours, this being their 5495th year from the creation; or whether it happened through the inadvertency of copyists, which yet was hardly ever granted by any true Jew; their chronology can no more be reconciled to ours, than to that of the Egyptians, or of any other nation.

THE truth is, that all their records, the sacred books excepted, are not only of recenter date than their Talmud, but seem wholly directed by it. So that whatever small difference is to be met with between them, in point of chronology, is rather owing to a different reading or understanding of that book, than a deviation from it; and of what authority both this and the others ought to be to us, we need not tell the reader. However, for the satisfaction of those who are not acquainted with these chronological works, we shall subjoin some few of the most considerable, together with their authors, as far as they are known, and the time in which they were compiled.

AND here we shall pass by their fictitious Josephus Ben Gorion, whom they have obtruded upon the world instead of the real one, so well known to the Christians, and so often mentioned in this history. The reader may see an account of these two, and the reasons of the former being trumped up by the Jews, in opposition to the latter, in Prideaux's Connexion [c], where he will find also a fuller account of the following chronological works; which we shall, for that reason, content ourselves with the bare mention of, and only observe here, that they follow the Hebrew text as far as it goes; the rest is mostly supplied by the Talmud to the time of its being compiled, and then by authors of a recenter date.

[c] Preface to the 3d vol. p. 18. & seq.

THE

THE firſt is the Sedar Holam rabbah, or large Chronicle; which contains a ſhort hiſtory from the creation, and is generally attributed to one rabbi Joſe Ben Chalephta, who flouriſhed, if we may believe the generality of the Jews, about 130 years after Chriſt, and is ſaid to have been maſter to the famous Jehudah Hakodeſh, the compiler of the Miſhnah [d]; but what ſhews him to be of more modern date is, that his work is continued down to the time of the emperor Adrian [e]. And Prideaux obſerves, that the book is ſtuffed with rabbinic fables; which certainly appear to have been taken out of the Babyloniſh Talmud; from which he concludes that it was written after it [f]. To this we may add what a learned Jew tells us [g], that he had ſeen a copy of it, in which it was ſaid, that the author lived 760 years after the deſtruction of the temple.

2. THE Sheeloth and Teſhuboth, are queſtions and anſwers, dialoguewiſe; of rabbi Sherira, ſurnamed Gaon, or the ſublime. This is a chronological epitome, the author of which flouriſhed from the year 967 downward [h].

3. THE Sedar Holam Zutta, or the leſſer Chronicle, another epitome of hiſtory, from the creation to the year of Chriſt 552; but whoſe unknown author lived, as the book itſelf ſays, about the year 1123 [i].

4. Sepher Cabbala Rabbi Abraham Levita Ben Dior; this book pretends to give a continued and uninterrupted ſucceſſion of all the patriarchs, prophets, elders, and wiſe men, through whoſe hands the oral tradition paſſed, from Adam to Moſes, and ſo on to the compilers of the Talmud, and from thence to the year of Chriſt 1141. This author doth often abridge the fictitious Joſephus Ben Gorion, and is ſuppoſed to be the firſt who brought that ſpurious author and his book into credit among the Jews.

5. THE Sepher Juchaſin, or book of genealogies, from the creation to the year of Chriſt 1500. This is a much larger work than any of the former.

6. THE Shalſheleth, or chain of the cabbala, of the ſame kind with the Juchaſin.

7. THE Tzemach David, or ſprout of David, treats on the ſame ſubject with the two laſt. Theſe three are ſtill more modern, and leſs worth our notice [k]. Beſides theſe, we find an

[c] [d] Vid. WOLF. Bibliot. Rabbin. num. 848. p. 462. & ſeq. [e] See MORIN. BARTOLC. BUXTORF. & al. [f] PRID. ubi ſup. [g] R. AZAR. Meor. Henaim. pt. 3. [h] Vid. WOLF. & PRID. ubi ſup. [i] Vid. Sepher Juchaſin, Shalſheleth & Tzemach David. ap. WOLF. ub. ſup. [k] Id. & PRID. ub. ſup.

apocryphal

apocryphal book, intituled, Dibre hajamim, or chronicle of Moſes; but which is univerſally rejected by the Jews as well as Chriſtians. As for the Samaritan chronicle, publiſhed by Bernard [l] and Baſnage [m], it is ſo ſhort, obſcure, and incorrect, that it could yield us but little help in this particular, were it of greater authority than it is. Theſe, eſpecially the firſt ſeven, are the books which the Jews urge againſt our chronology, and from which they pretend to demonſtrate, that Chriſt appeared earlier in the world by about 240 years, than we ſay he did: But as their authority is altogether founded upon that of the Talmud, we ſhall ſpend no more time in confuting either [n].

WE paſs by alſo the Jewiſh Targums, or Chaldee paraphraſes, becauſe we have none upon the book of the Judges or of the Kings. But upon the whole, whatever ſmall differences there may be between thoſe chronological works, they all agree in the ſeries and ſucceſſion of their kings and judges, in the ſame order of time as we find them in thoſe two ſacred books and that of the Chronicles. It is true, that this laſt doth ſometimes jar with thoſe of Samuel and Kings in point of numbers, whether of years or other things mentioned in both. But ſuch differences are ſcarce worth the pains which ſome critics have taken to reconcile them. We ſhall have occaſion, in the ſequel of their hiſtory, to hint at ſome of the latter ſort; and as to the firſt, the only inſtance we are going to give, will eaſily convince the reader, that, in theſe caſes, ſome errors have manifeſtly crept into the text, whether through the likeneſs of the numerical Hebrew letters, or the negligence of copyiſts, whatever the Jews may pretend to the contrary. The place we mean is, where the book of Chronicles ſays, that Ahaziah was 42 years of age when he began to reign [o], contrary to that of Kings, which makes him but [illegible] years old [p]. It will be no hard matter to find where the miſtake lies, ſince, according to the former author, the monarch muſt have been two years older than his father, who is affirmed to have died in the 40th year of his age [q]. It were ridiculous to follow the forced and unnatural ſolution of two or three authors, who have in vain endeavoured to ſolve the difficulty [r], againſt the far greater majority, who have plainly owned, that it could not be removed by any other way, than by owning the bigger number to be an error of the tranſcriber [r]. The following is the liſt of the judges and kings of Judah and Iſrael. As for their chronology and ſynchroniſms, we ſhall refer them, as we have done hitherto, the former to their hiſtory, and the latter to the chronological table at the end of this work.

[l] AP CALMET ſub voc. croniq. [m] Hiſtoire des Juifs. T. 6. lib. 8. c. 6. [n] Vid. PRID. Conn. ub. ſup. & pt. 1. lib. 5. [o] 2 Chron. xxii. 2. [p] 2 Kings viii. 26. [q] 2 Chr. xxi. ver. ult. [r] USSER. an. BROUGHTON, JUN. in loc.

A Table of the ISRAELITISH JUDGES.

1. Othniel, ſon-in-law to Joſhua (A).
2. Ehud.
3. Shamgar.
4. Deborah the propheteſs, and wife of Lapidoth (B), and Barak her general.
5. Gideon, or Jerubbaal.
6. Abimelech his ſon.
7. Tola.
8. Jair.
9. Jephthah the Gileadite.
10. Ibzan.
11. Elon.
12. Abdon.
13. Eli the high-prieſt.
14. Samſon.
15. Samuel.

The JEWISH KINGS before Jeroboam's Revolt.

Saul. Iſhboſheth. David. Solomon.

[r] JEROM. KIMCH. ABARBAN. L. DE DIEU. PISCAT. CAJET. SCALIG. GROT. CAPPEL. & al. mult. Vid. & NORT. KNATCHBUL Animadv. in N. T. in act. iv. LE SCEN. Eſſay on a N. Verſ. pt. 2. ch. vi. § 8. & al. mult.

(A) Joſephus makes Kenaz the father of Othniel, to have been the firſt judge in Iſrael (1); and takes no notice of his ſon, either as his copartner, or ſucceſſor; but the text is intirely againſt him, which gives that dignity to the latter, and attributes the ſignal victory to him; for which he was choſen and continued in it forty years (2).

(B) Some read אשת־לפידות Eſheth-Lapidoth, a woman of Lapidoth, ſuppoſing that to be the name of the place of her abode; and others, becauſe Lapidoth properly ſignifies lamps, will have her called by that name, becauſe ſhe ſpun the cotton for the lamps that burnt in the holy place. But all this is ſaid without foundation, and Deborah is not the only propheteſs that had a huſband. Witneſs Huldah the wife of Shallum, mentioned in a former note. It doth not appear what tribe Deborah was of; the place of her abode was upon the frontiers of Benjamin and Ephraim (3), and theſe were indifferently inhabited by either tribe.

(1) Ant. lib. V. c. 4. (2) See Judg. iii. 8. & ſeq. (3 Ibid. iv. 5.

KINGS of JUDAH and ISRAEL after the division of the two kingdoms.

JUDAH.	ISRAEL.
Reboboam.	Jeroboam.
Abijam.	Nadab.
Asa.	Baasha.
	Elah.
	Zimri.
	Omri.
	Ahab.
Jehoshaphat.	Ahaziah.
Jehoram.
Ahaziah.	Jehoram.
Athaliah.	Jehu.
Jehoash.
Amaziah.	Jehoahaz.
Uzziah, or Azariah.	Jehoash.
	Jeroboam II.
	An inter-regnum of 11½ years.
	Zachariah.
	Shallum.
	Menahem.
Jotham.	Pekahiah.
Ahaz.	Pekah.
Hezekiah.	Hoshea.
Manasseh.
Amon.
Josiah.
Shallum, or Jehoahaz.
Eliakim, or Jehoiakim.
Jechoniah, or Coniah, called also Jehoiakim.
Mattaniah, called also Zedekiah.

SECT.

SECT. VII.

The Hiſtory of the JUDGES that governed Iſrael, from the Death of Joſhua to Saul their firſt king.

JOSHUA had attained to the 110th year of his age, by that time he had finiſhed his arduous task of ſettling the tribes each in their proper lot, diſmiſſing the two tribes and half to their own, on the other ſide Jordan, and appointing the cities of the Levites, and of Refuge, as we have ſeen in a former ſection. Finding therefore, that he was drawing to his end, he called to him all the heads of Iſrael at Shechema [a]; and after the example of Moſes, reminded them of all the wonderful and ſignal favours which God had ſhewed to them, from their fore-father Abraham unto that time; and how much they were bound by intereſt as well as duty, to continue ſtedfaſt in their obedience to him, and by no means to ſuffer themſelves to be enſnared into idolatry, or into a conformity with the ways of the Canaanites; which could not but prove fatal to them, as it had been to their anceſtors. He added, that as for them they were at their choice, whether they would ſerve the Lord, or the gods of Canaan; but himſelf and his houſe were fully reſolved to continue ſtedfaſt in the worſhip of the true God. This pathetic exhortation of their venerable general, whom they now ſaw for the laſt time, extorted from them an univerſal promiſe, that they would all follow his example, and cleave unto God. Joſhua took care to ſee it recorded, and cauſed a monument to be erected in memory of this new covenant, under the oak that grew in the precinct of the tabernacle. He died ſoon after, and was buried at Timnath-ſerah in mount Ephraim, which was his own inheritance. His death was ſoon followed by that of Eleazar the ſon of Aaron, who was ſucceeded by his ſon Phinehas in the high-prieſthood. By degrees the reſt of the ſeventy elders, who had outlived Joſhua died alſo; and with them, one would have thought, not only the remembrance of Joſhua and of their late covenant, ſo ſolemnly ſworn to by all the tribes, but even all ſenſe of religion and fear of God, or regard to his laws; inſomuch, that Joſhua had been ſcarce dead twenty years, before we find them ſunk over head and ears into confuſion and idolatry.

Joſhua's death.

Year of the Flood, 1556. Year before Chriſt, 1443.

A GREAT part of Canaan remained ſtill unconquered when that general died, ſo that they could not, without purſuing their conqueſt, ſecure the poſſeſſion of what they had. Judah was appointed by the oracle to begin the war; Caleb, the ſon of Jephunneh, famous for his bravery and faithfulneſs, in the report he made of the land of Canaan [b], was head of that tribe, and engaged that of Simeon, with which his own was interwoven, to join forces with him againſt the king of Bezek [c]. We have ſeen elſewhere the juſt fate of that inſolent petty prince †. As for Caleb, he ſet himſelf immediately about the conqueſt of Jeruſalem, which had been retaken by the Jebuſites from the tribe of Benjamin, and ſoon after took and burnt it to the ground; the beſieged retiring into the fortreſs of Zion [d]. After this he turned his forces towards the ſouth, againſt the cities of Hebron [e], or Kirjath-arba, and Debir, called alſo Kirjath-ſepher, which were then inhabited by the gigantic ſons of Anak. Theſe had been formerly promiſed to him by Moſes, as a reward of his faithfulneſs, and yielded to him accordingly by Joſhua a little before his death: Caleb however who was then above fourſcore and five years of age, tho' ſtill ſtrong and vigorous, thought it prudent not to exhauſt his ſtrength too far in the ſiege of thoſe ſtrong places, and therefore propoſed his daughter Achſah as a reward to the man that took Kirjath-ſepher; and it was not long before it was gained by Othniel, a man of valour and of his own family (A), whoſe conduct and bravery upon this occaſion did raiſe him ſoon after to the dignity of judge.

[a] Joſh. xxiii. & xxiv. p. tot.

Judah's war.

WHILST

[b] Vid. Numb. xiii. 6. & 30. xiv. 6, & alib. [c] Judg. i. 3. & ſeq. † See Vol. II. p. 180. [d] Judg. i. 8. [e] Vid. Joſh. xiv. 9, & ſeq.

(A) The text calls him the ſon of Kenaz, brother to Caleb (1); ſo that it is not eaſy to determine, whether he, or his father, was Caleb's brother. The ſeptuagint and vulgate have taken it in the firſt ſenſe; but it is plain, he was not his brother by the father's ſide, becauſe the one is called the ſon of Jephunneh, and the other the ſon of Kenaz; neither can they be ſuppoſed to be uterine brothers, becauſe, in ſuch a caſe, the law of Moſes would not have permitted the one to have given his daughter to the other. The diſparity of age is another proof of it: Caleb was then above 85 years of age; Othniel therefore muſt be ſuppoſed much younger, to have married his daughter, who was an heireſs. Neither could he have married her, if his father Kenaz had been Caleb's brother; becauſe the marriage of an aunt is likewiſe forbidden by the Moſaic law. It is therefore more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that Caleb and Kenaz were

(1) Joſh. xv. 17. Jud. i. 13.

firſt-

WHILST Caleb and his new ſon-in-law were employed in enlarging their inheritance, the other tribes were doing the ſame in their ſeveral lots. But whether out of compaſſion to the poor Canaanites, doomed to deſtruction, or out of an ambitious deſire of having vaſſals under them, they wholly neglected the expreſs order of their law-giver, and inſtead of extirpating them, contented themſelves with laying them under tribute; this proved the ſource of all their misfortunes, and of thoſe many ſlaveries that enſued; for the oppreſſed Canaanites did, at leaſt in appearance, ſo patiently ſubmit to their yoke, that they became leſs cautious of them; they grew by degrees more intimate with them, and by that means were ſo far enſnared with the beauty of their women, as to contract affinities with them. Theſe unhappy intermarriages ſoon debauched them into all their idolatries, and reconciled them to the worſhip of Baal, Aſhtaroth, and other gods of Canaan, and at once provoked God to forſake them, and gave their enemies an opportunity of regaining their liberties, and of oppreſſing them in their turns.

IT was during this time of apoſtacy and confuſion, that Micah, a wealthy man of the tribe of Ephraim, is ſuppoſed to have erected that idol in his houſe, which was ſoon after taken from him by the Danites, and ſet up at Dan. The ſtory of it is indeed related at the end of the book of the Judges, from whence ſome have concluded, that it happened after Samſon's death [f]; whilſt others place it about the latter end firſt-couſins, which the original doth often call brothers; in which caſe Othniel and Achſah might lawfully marry. St. Auſtin and after him Vatablus, affirm Othniel to have been not only a great warriour, but alſo a learned doctor of that law (2), and ſo doubly eager for the conqueſt of a place which was the ſeat of learning at that time †. The Jews tell us wonders of the beauty of Caleb's daughter. However her husband was not ſo well ſatisfied with her and her portion, but he prevailed upon her to ſue for an addition to it; which ſhe accordingly did; and upon her complaining of the drought and barrenneſs of the ſouth high lands, which her father had given her, ſhe obtained thoſe of the valleys beneath, which were better watered, and conſequently more fertile. This happened in Joſhua's time (3).

[f] Vid. Sedar Holam. SERAR. & al. in loc.

(2) Vid Vatabl. in loc. † See before p. 423. ſub. fin. not. (I)
(3) Vid. Joſh. & Jud. ub. ſup.

of

of Joshua's life [g]; but the far greater part between Caleb's death and Othniel's being chosen judge [h]. Till that time, the idolatrous Israelites seem to have contented themselves with the idols of the Canaanites, without setting up any of their own. Micah was the first we read of, that took it into his head to outdo them, not only by erecting this, but by consecrating an apartment of his house to it, and procuring a wandering Levite to officiate to it. The story, giving us a lively idea of the monstrous absurdities of the religion of those times, and of the degeneracy of the Israelites, who could so soon give into them, cannot well be omitted.

The story of Micah.

Micah felt a remorse for having wronged a covetous and superstitious mother of 1100 pieces of silver, which amounted to somewhat above that number of shillings of our money, and for which she had bestowed some severe curses upon him. She conceived such joy at his restoring them to her, that she resolved to consecrate the greatest part of it to what she thought a religious use, such as might prove an equivalent blessing to him, for the curses he had extorted from her. Accordingly, with part of that silver, she and her son purchased two idols, one molten, and the other carved; and with the rest they built a chapel to set them up in, together with some teraphim, which they had, in all likelihood, already in the house; they being a kind of little statues, or houshold gods, which the corrupted Israelites had in common with other nations *. To this they added an ephod, or priestly garment, with which Micah installed his son to the priestly office of his new gods. Soon after this, a young indigent Levite wandering by that way, was hired as a more proper person for that office than his own son.

Year of the Flood, 1586. Year before Christ 1413

Micah thought himself then highly blest; and, having his chapel so well furnished with idols, and, with a priest to administer to them, began to think, that nothing could hinder him from the favour of GOD [i]; when the Danites, who found themselves too streightened in their own tribe, sent out some spies to seek for a new habitation. These chanced to come by that way, and having consulted the Levite about the success of their journey, and received a favourable answer, went directly to Laish, a considerable town, whose rich inhabitants, like those of Zidon, lived in a careless security, without magistrates, soldiery, or strength. They returned, and acquainted their tribe with the joyful

[g] MASIUS. DE LYR. RIBER. & al. [h] Vid. CORN. a LAPID. GROT. USSER. MUNST CALMET. & al. * See Vol. II. p. 401. not. (B). [i] Judg. xvii. pass. vid. ver. ult.

news;

news; upon which the Danites of Zorah and Eſhtaol armed 600 of their men; and theſe, with their five ſpies at their head, marched immediately towards Laiſh. In their way, the ſpies acquainted them with what they had ſeen at Micah's chapel, and in particular with his having a young Levite there, named Jonathan, the ſon of Gerſhom, from whoſe mouth they had received a promiſe of ſucceſs in this expedition. The text rightly obſerves, that there was at that time no king in Iſrael, and that every one did what was right in his own eyes [k]. The Danites therefore, inſtead of reproving Micah for his apoſtacy, and deſtroying his idolatrous chapel, entered it by main force, took away the idols, teraphim, and ephod, and forced the young prieſt to go along with them to Laiſh. Micah purſued after them, and made loud complaints that they had robbed him of all that was valuable in life [l]; all the anſwer they gave him was, that his outcries might coſt him his life, and that it was his ſafeſt way to go home quietly. They ſoon arrived at Laiſh, took and deſtroyed it, with its inhabitants; and having built a new city, and called it Dan, after the name of their progenitor, they ſet up their idols there, and retained young Jonathan and his ſons to be their prieſts. The Septuagint, vulgate, and ſome Jewiſh rabbies, call him the grandſon of Moſes, but the original the grandſon of Manaſſeh [m]. As for the idol, the text ſays, that it continued there till the captivity of the land; and what that means, we have ſhewed in a former note.

A bloody war againſt Benjamin.

DURING theſe years of anarchy, the inhabitants of Gibeah in the tribe of Benjamin were guilty of ſo horrid a breach of hoſpitality towards a wandering Levite, as proved the cauſe of much bloodſhed, and was like to have occaſioned the ruin of that whole tribe. The Levite was bringing his eloped concubine home, and was come to that place towards ſun-ſet. After he had waited ſome time in vain for ſome body to lodge him that night, an old man coming from his work, who was a ſojourner there, being of the tribe of Ephraim, came at laſt and invited him to his houſe. They had ſcarce made an end of refreſhing themſelves, when a band of profligate young fellows ſurrounded the houſe, and in a tumultuous manner, demanded the ſtranger to be ſacrificed to their brutiſh luſt, which they made no difficulty to expreſs in the plaineſt terms. This gives one reaſon to believe, that it was no unuſual thing amongſt them. The Levite found no other way of ſaving himſelf, but by delivering his concu-

[k] Ibid. ver. 6. [l] Ibid. xviii. 24. [m] Ibid. ver. 30.

bine

bine to them ; and on the next morning he found her dead at the threſhold of the door, whether of ſhame and regret, or of the grievous abuſe ſhe had ſuffered that night. It was in vain to complain of this cruelty in ſuch an abandoned place; he took therefore the dead body with him, and brought it to his own houſe, where he divided it into twelve pieces, and ſent one of them to each tribe, with an account of the occaſion of it. The ſurpriſed tribes aſſembled themſelvs from all parts of Iſrael to Mizpeh, to the number of 400,000 fighting men, and there the Levite gave them a farther account of the injury, which had been done to his concubine, but cunningly concealed his own weakneſs and cowardice, in ſacrificing her to his own ſafety [n]. The whole people had ſcarce heard his ſtory out, when they roſe up as one man, and reſolved not to return to their reſpective homes, till they had puniſhed the authors of that unheard-of action with the utmoſt ſeverity. Whilſt therefore they deputed every tenth man to their reſpective tribes, to fetch them arms and proviſion for the war, they ſent deputies to the heads of the tribe of Benjamin, to demand the delivery of theſe profligate Gibeathites. But that haughty tribe, inſtead of complying with their requeſt, armed 26000 of their beſt warriours, beſides 700 of the inhabitants of Gibeah, to go out againſt them. This unexpected ſtubbornneſs did only exaſperate the eleven tribes the more, and made them vow to take a fuller revenge on that of Benjamin. However, they thought proper before all things to conſult the Lord, not whether they ſhould undertake the war againſt their brethren, for that they took for granted was both lawful and incumbent upon them ; but which of the tribes ſhould go out firſt againſt Benjamin ; and the Lord anſwered by the mouth of Phinehas, the then high-prieſt, that Judah ſhould go firſt. They gave them battle accordingly on the next morning, not doubting of a complete victory ; but it proved quite otherwiſe, and Judah was repulſed with the loſs of 22000 men. This unexpected defeat filled them with ſurpriſe, and made them apply themſelves again to God, to know whether they ſhould purſue the war againſt their brethren of Benjamin ; who anſwered them by the high-prieſt, that they ſhould engage them a ſecond time, though without promiſing them the victory ; and upon their coming up againſt Gibeah, they were again repulſed with the loſs of 18,000 men, by a vigorous ſally which the inhabitants made upon them. This ſecond diſappointment did almoſt drive them to deſpair; at length they reſolved to return to Shiloh, and to lie proſtrate before the ark all that night, and by ſacrifices, faſting, and prayers, to intreat the Lord, either to grant them a victory, or to declare his diſpleaſure againſt the war which they had engaged in. This humble behaviour of theirs obtained at length a favourable anſwer, and the high-prieſt promiſed them, that the Lord would, on the next onſet, deliver the Benjamites into their hands. This anſwer inſpired them with freſh courage; but yet they thought it adviſeable to add policy to their ſtrength. To this end a ſtratagem was put in execution, which had its deſired effect. They divided themſelves into three bodies, one of which ſhould lie in ambuſh, and be ready to enter in and ſet fire to the city as ſoon as the men were ſallied out, after another body had made a ſham aſſault, on purpoſe to draw them out of the place in purſuit of them; whilſt the third and main body lay concealed in the neighbourhood of Baal-tamar, and ready to fall upon them. The children of Benjamin did eaſily give into the ſnare; and finding themſelves unwarily ſurpriſed in their purſuit by the main body, were thinking to retreat into the town; when upon turning themſelves about, they ſaw it all in flames, and were ſo diſheartened at the ſight, that they were all cut off, to the number of 25000. About 600 ſaved themſelves by flight, and went and fortified themſelves upon the tops of the rocks of Rimmon, and there abode four months, that is till they were called down by the other tribes in an amicable manner.

[n] Ibid. c. xx. 5. & ſeq.

IN the mean time, this victory did only whet the fury of the other tribes, which did not ſo much as cool till they had burnt down all their cities and villages, and killed all the inhabitants, without diſtinction of age or ſex, even to their very cattle; and made, as they thought, an utter end of that unfortunate tribe. It was then indeed that they began to reflect, with ſome remorſe, upon what they had done, and to bewail the loſs of one of their tribes. They went up to Shiloh again, and there expoſtulated with God, for having ſuffered ſuch an univerſal deſtruction without ſtopping their hand. They erected a large altar, probably becauſe that of the tabernacle was not capacious enough for the multitude of their victims, and having been informed, that the ſix hundred, which were eſcaped from the ſlaughter, were ſtill upon the rocks of Rimmon, they entreated God to direct them how to recal them peaceably, to reſtore the loſt tribe by their means. There was however one main impediment to it, namely a raſh oath they had made at Mizpeh, when they vowed the war againſt Benjamin, that none of them would give their daughters to any of that tribe. The oath, being unlawful in itſelf, might have been diſſolved by the high-prieſt, who was there preſent; but whether conſcience was more tender in this reſpect than it generally was in all others, they bethought themſelves of another expedient, which would anſwer their end, without the danger of being perjured, though it was ſcarcely ſo juſtifiable as the breach of ſuch an oath would have been, even though they had had no Phinehas to have abſolved them from it. They cauſed a ſtrict ſearch to be made in their muſter-rolls, whether any of the tribes had failed to come to the camp at Mizpeh, and upon enquiry it was found that the inhabitants of Jabeſh-Gilead, belonging to the half tribe of Manaſſeh, on the other ſide of Jordan, had not come to the general aſſembly. One would expect, therefore, that as they had had no ſhare in the oath with the other tribes, they would only have obliged them to furniſh thoſe ſix hundred men with wives; but they went a more cruel way to work, and ſent twelve thouſand armed men, with orders to deſtroy all the inhabitants of the place, except the virgins. Theſe ſoon went and executed this bloody command, and brought four hundred virgins captive, which were given to as many of the remaiming men of Benjamin. There were ſtill two hundred unprovided for, and no more towns to be condemned to the fate of Jabeſh; however rather than break their oaths for their ſakes, they bethought themſelves of a way of evading it, by giving them leave to take that by force, which they thought not lawful to give them of their own accord. The men took their advice, and lay perdue in the vineyards about Shiloh, and when the young damſels came out of it with tabrets and dances, from ſome ſolemn feaſt as is ſuppoſed, every man ſeized upon one of them, and took them home, whilſt the reſt of the tribes returned alſo every man to his habitation[o]. The ſix hundred men ſoon rebuilt their cities, and the tribe of Benjamin, thus reſtored by degrees to its former valour and ſtrength, did cleave ever after to that of Judah, and gave the ſecond judge and firſt king unto Iſrael.

BY theſe two inſtances, the reader may judge into what degree of degeneracy the whole nation was fallen, in that little interval between the death of Caleb, and his ſon-in-law's being choſen judge. What is ſtill more ſurpriſing is, that the preſence of one good man in authority

[o] Judg. xxi.

ſhould

ſhould be able to put a ſtop to ſuch a vehement propenſity to idolatry, which, immediately after his death, could not be contained within any bounds, but broke out like a torrent with double force. Yet this was the caſe of the Iſraelites during all the time of their judges; the ſame that delivered them from thraldom freed them alſo from idolatry, and he was no ſooner dead than their innocence and obedience were at an end, tho' their peace and happineſs were ſure to end with it: thus every epoch is only an alternate ſucceſſion of ſinning and repentance, of ſervitude and deliverance. What thoſe nations were which they ſuffered to live amongſt them, and by whom they were ſo often corrupted, enſlaved, and delivered from by turns, we have already ſeen in the hiſtory of Canaan †, to which we ſhall refer the reader once for all, to avoid, as much as the ſeries of this hiſtory will permit, all unneceſſary repetitions.

THE firſt ſlavery which their defection brought upon them, was under Chuſhanriſhathaim, king of Meſopotamia, who held them in ſubjection about eight years; at the end of which, the warlike Othniel found means to raiſe an army againſt him, with which he gained a ſignal victory, and freed Iſrael from the yoke of that potent prince. The text gives us no farther account of that war, which could not but be much to the Hebrew general's honour, conſidering the ſtrength of his enemy. All that it adds is, that his ſucceſs obtained him a peace which laſted forty years; that is, till the death of their judge and deliverer [p]. This victory happened about 38 years after Joſhua's death; as for that of Othniel, it is not eaſy to fix it [q]. Othniel, the firſt judge.

SOON after it, they fell again under ſervitude to the Moabites, and at the end of eighteen years, Ehud their ſecond judge, who was of the tribe of Benjamin, being deputed to carry the yearly tribute to Eglon their king, freed them by the death of that prince, whom he privately ſtabbed, whilſt he was delivering a pretended meſſage from God to him; and having eſcaped undiſcovered, blew the trumpet, and raiſed a ſufficient army, with which he ſhook off the Moabitiſh yoke, and procured his people another forty years peace [r]. Ehud, ſecond judge.

Year of the Flood, 1674. Year before Chriſt 1325.

Shamgar, their third judge, delivered them from ſome ſmall oppreſſion which they ſuffered from the Philiſtines. The text gives us no further particulars about him, than that Shamgar, third judge † See Vol. II. p. 181. & ſeq. [p] Judg. iii. 8 & ſeq. [q] Vid. Annal. Uſſer. p. 28. [r] Judg. iii. 12, & ſeq. See Vol. II. p. 91.

he slew six hundred of them with an ox-goad, or, as the Latin and Greek versions render it, with a plough-share[r] (B). How long he judged Israel is not to be guessed at: he was succeeded by Deborah, fourth judge.

THE prophetess Deborah, soon after the smart of a fourth servitude, worse and longer than any of the three former, had brought them to a sense of their sins and ingratitude. Israel was for every market, and as ready as they were to sell themselves to some new crimes, so was providence to sell them to new lords. The text takes notice, that after the death of their judge, they fell into new crimes, and God, to punish them for it, raised up a more powerful adversary against them, Jabin king of Canaan, whose strength besides a numerous army and a valiant general, consisted in an incredible number of iron chariots[s]; whereby he held them in severe subjection twenty years; yet when their cries and repentance had obtained a promise of a speedy deliverance, lest they should arrogate to themselves any share in the glory of their future victory, two women are chosen to be the main instruments of it, and Jael compleats what Deborah had concerted, and Barak, at the head of ten thousand men, discomfited Sisera and his numerous army, tho' strengthened with nine hundred chariots of iron[u]; and the land of Israel, from a dismal solitude[w], began to resume its former fertility and splendor. We have given an account of this famous action in a former chapter †, which [r] Judg. iii. ver. ult. See Vol. II. p. 208. & not. (S) [s] Judg. iv, 1. & seq. v. 8. [u] Judg. iv. 15, & seq. [w] Vid. Ch. v. ver. 6, & 7. † See Vol. II. p 185. not. (I).

(B) The word is מלמד הבקר Malmad habakar, which signifies any instrument by which oxen are broke to labour. We have taken notice, under another head, that the Philistines were more careful than any other nation to strip the Jews of all their weapons of war, whenever they had them in subjection †; and if this was the case at present, it is likely that expression means only such rustical instruments, as he and his men could lay their hands on. But as the text mentions nothing of any previous servitude, it is probable that the deliverance here spoken of, was only from some incursion of the Philistines, perhaps in ploughing time, when they thought they might be more easily surprised, but in which they were repulsed with loss, by the vigilance and bravery of their then judge.

† See before, p. 370.

gave

gave occaſion to that noble ſong of deliverance, which Deborah compoſed immediately after it, and which procured them a reſpite of forty years [x].

THE ungrateful Iſraelites, having by that time forgot that ſignal deliverance, are plagued with a freſh bondage, and with which that of Jabin compared might be called freedom. Under the laſt, Deborah was allowed to judge Iſrael in the face of the ſun, but now they are not only without judge, but even without habitation, except what they are forced to ſeek for among the clefts and caverns of the rocks; and if they find time and convenience to ſow, their enemies pour in upon them, and reap the fruit of their labours [y]. Under this miſerable tyranny they were groaning, when God did firſt ſend a prophet to convince them how juſtly they ſuffered this hard Midianitiſh bondage [z]; after which he made choice of a proper perſon to undertake their deliverance. Gideon was privately threſhing his corn, to ſave it from becoming a prey either to Midian or Amalek; when the angel of the LORD ſaluted him with the title of the valiant ſaviour of his people, and convinced him by repeated miracles, that Iſrael, whom he now looked upon as forſaken by God, ſhould be ſpeedily and miraculouſly reſtored to their wiſhed for freedom by his means. Gideon on the one hand, was too well experienced a warrior, and too well acquainted with the dejected condition of his nation, to think that ſuch a deliverance could be wrought by an arm of fleſh; and on the other, he was ſo far from expecting ſuch a ſupernatural aſſiſtance, that he ſeemed even to doubt of the truth of all thoſe wonders which God had wrought in favour of them [a]. At length, to confirm his wavering faith, he obtained leave of the heavenly meſſenger to go and fetch a ſacrifice, and to offer it at his feet; which he had no ſooner done, but upon the angel's touching it with the end of his ſtaff, a miraculous fire aroſe out of the rock on which it was laid, and conſumed the whole ſacrifice; immediately after which the angel vaniſhed out of his ſight. Gideon was filled with ſurpriſe and dread, at the thoughts of the divine preſence which he had beheld, but God was pleaſed to diſſipate his fears; in memory of which, he reared an altar on the place, and called it Jehovah-Shalom [b]. Gideon.

ON that very night, the Lord commanded him to begin his heaven-appointed taſk, with the deſtruction of the altar and grove of Baal, the fatal ſource of Iſrael's defection and punishment; and to expiate their crime by the sacrifice of a bullock of seven years, in the place where they had served that Midianitish deity. Gideon was only eager to obey, but knowing the hazard of such an enterprize, should he set about it in the day-time, resolved to finish it that very night, which he accordingly did by the help of ten of his servants, whom he called to the work. This unexpected devastation was no sooner perceived on the next morning, than the whole city came to Joash's house, and in an insolent manner demanded, that he should deliver up his son to be put to death, for his sacrilege against Baal; but the grave old man soon made them sensible of their absurd zeal for an impotent deity, which could not defend his altar and honour against his son. It is probable, he used some other topics to repress their fury; and that this only is mentioned, because his son got the surname of Jerubbaal by it, that is, Let Baal look to himself.

[x] Judg. v. ver. ult. [y] Ibid. vi. 3, & ſeq. [z] Ibid. ver. 8, & ſeq. [a] Ver. 13. [b] Ver. 24.

and

IN the mean time the Midianites and their confederates, whether from the jealousy which this action of Gideon might inspire them with, or any other tendency they might observe in the Israelites to revolt, began to cover the spacious plain of Jezreel with their troops. [c] Gideon on the other hand had summoned the tribes of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali to appear in arms; but whether the sight of so numerous an host as was preparing against him, had weakened his faith or that of his troops, he begged for a farther miraculous proof of the divine assistance, which was, that the fleece of wool which he spread that night on the threshing-floor might be found on the next morning covered with the dew of heaven, whilst all the ground round about it remained dry. He had no sooner obtained this miracle, and wrung a bowl full of water out of the fleece, but he begged, that for a further confirmation of the miracle and of their faith, the fleece might be the only thing that received no moisture, whilst all the ground round about it was wet. This was also granted at his request, and Gideon, thus assured of a complete victory, led his small army against the enemy, and encamped over against them. It consisted but of 32000 men, which were but a poor handful, compared to those confederate forces of Midian, Amalek, and of the Arabians [d]; but God, who designed to take away all occasion, both from the ungrateful Jews and their enemies, to attribute the success to their number or valour, commanded Gideon to make a proclamation through his army, and to dis-

[c] Ver. 36, & seq. [d] See Ch. vii. 12.

band

band all that were faint-hearted; upon which 22000 of his daſtardly troops were immediately diſmiſſed. Gideon by this time thought probably, that his army was ſufficiently reduced; when he was again commanded to lead it to the water ſide, and there ſeparate thoſe who went down upon their knees to drink, from thoſe who lapped the water out of the hollow of their hand. There were found but 300 of the latter, and God promiſed him the victory by them (C), and ordered the reſt to be ſent away. For a further confirmation, Gideon was commanded to go into the Midianitiſh camp, attended only by a ſervant, and there he would be informed what notion his enemies had of him: upon his coming, he heard one ſoldier telling a dream to another of a barley cake tumbling into their camp, and overturning a tent down to the ground, and the other interpreting it of Gideon's ſword diſcomfiting the confederate hoſt. Gideon delayed not to verify the omen: he returned to his 300 men, commanded them to take every man a horn in one hand, and a pitcher with a light concealed in it in the other, and led them into the enemies camp about the dead of the night. Here he divided them into three bands, and ſent them to give the alarm at three ſeveral quarters, by ſounding their

(C) It is not eaſy to gueſs from this different manner of their quenching their thirſt, whether the 300 were choſen for any particular virtue which this action did indicate, or for the reverſe. Some authors think, that the 9700 who kneeled down, gave a token of their courage, in that they were not afrid of the nearneſs of their enemy, but choſe to drink at their eaſe; whilſt the others betrayed their cowardice, by being contented with taking a handful of water running, and that God made choice of them to make the victory appear more miraculous (4). Others on the contrary think, that thoſe that were weak and diſheartened kneeled down, and the couragious and ſtrong took the water up with their hand (5). It is hard to decide which is in the right; but the Jews have gone farther for a reaſon why theſe 300 were preferred; namely, that there was a ſtatue of Baal on the other ſide of the water, ſo that they ſcrupled to kneel down to drink, leſt they ſhould be thought to pay any worſhip to the idol; whilſt the others, more concerned for their eaſe than for the honour of God, were ſet aſide, as unworthy to have a ſhare in ſo ſignal a victory (6). But the reader may chooſe whether he will take their word for there being really any ſuch idol in the way.

(4) Ita Joſeph. Ant. lib. v. c. 8. Rabbin. aliq. Toſtat. & al.
(5) De Lyr. Montan. Corn. a Lap. & al. (6) Vid. Munſt. in loc. & before p. 157. not. F.

horns,

horns, breaking their pitchers, and discovering their glaring lights at the signal given, which was crying out The sword of the Lord and of Gideon, and which was to be answered by all the rest. The success of this stratagem was the total defeat of the confederate army †; and Israel gaining, with their freedom, an immense quantity of the richest spoil.

Gideon, resolving to make the best advantage of this victory, summoned several tribes to pursue after the enemy, and to secure the fords of Beth-barah, and Jordan; and the cowardly 22000, who dared not look the enemy in the face, began now to take courage, when they saw them flying, and to pursue them one way, whilst himself and his 300 men went after another flying party another way. These last went over Jordan, and by that time Gideon and his men were come to Succoth, they found themselves so faint and tired, that he was forced to send to demand some refreshment for them out of that city, that he might continue his pursuit after the princes of Midian, Zebah and Zalmunna; but he had the mortification to be denied by the inhabitants, who sent him word, that it would be time enough for him to exact such a supply of provision, when he brought those two princes prisoners with him. Gideon contented himself for the present, with threatening to punish the insolent Succothites in the severest manner, and continued his journey with his men, faint as they were, till he came to Penuel, where he again sent the same message, and received the same repulse that he had done at Succoth. Whether the desire of revenge, or his hearing that the two princes he was in pursuit of, were in the neighbourhood of Karkor with 15000 men, the poor remains of an army of 120000, inspired him with fresh vigour, he stopped not his pace till he was come upon them unawares, and had secured the two princes, and routed the rest of their men.

IN the mean time, the Ephraimites had overtaken and slain Oreb and Zeeb, two other princes of Midian, and brought their heads to Gideon, as he was returning from Karkor with his two royal prisoners; and whether their success had made them arrogant, or whether they envied their judge's glory, they accosted him with an insolent demand, Why he had not summoned their tribe to the war against Midian? Gideon, instead of repressing their ill-timed arrogance, contented himself at present with extolling their atchievements above his own, telling them, that the gleanings of Ephraim's laurels did vastly outweigh the vintage of his own tribe [e]; and having pacified them with this ſoothing anſwer, went to diſcharge his reſentment againſt thoſe who had more richly deſerved it, the cities of Succoth and Penuel. Conſidering the fatigue which he had undergone all that day and the night before, one would expect, that he would have allowed himſelf ſome reſpite, before he went upon ſo ſevere an enterprize; but the remembrance of the cruel uſage he had received from thoſe two places, and of what he and his men had ſuffered for want of their aſſiſtance, would not ſuffer him to let the ſun go down (D), before he had made them ſuffer the puniſhment which he had vowed againſt them. In his way to Succoth he met with a youth of that place, who gave him the names of ſeventy ſeven of its chief magiſtrates and elders, and when he was entered into the city, after having reproved the inhabitants for their brutiſh inſolence, he cauſed thoſe ſeventy ſeven men to undergo a very ſevere correction as a determent to the reſt (E), and at the ſame time he commanded thoſe of Penuel to be all put to the ſword, and their tower to be demoliſhed to the ground [f]. He then examined his two priſoners concerning ſome men, whom they had ſlain at mount Tabor, and underſtanding by the deſcription they gave of them that they were his own brethren, he ſet aſide all thoughts of mercy towards them, and put them to death on the ſpot [g].

† See Vol. II. p. 121.

ly

† See Vol. II. p. 121. [e] Judg. viii. 1. & ſeq. [f] Ver. 13. ad 17.. [g] 18, & ſeq. See Vol. II. p. 122.

(D) The text is ſomewhat obſcure in this place, ſo that it is not eaſy to determine, whether the words, before the ſun (7), mean before its going down on that day, or its riſing on the next morning. Our verſion underſtands it in the latter ſenſe, but the Jews and the generality of Chriſtian interpreters in the firſt. And indeed it is ſcarce credible, that Gideon and his men could continue a whole day and two nights in action; and if we remember, that it was about mid-night when he put the enemies camp to the rout, he had time enough the next day to perform all the reſt.

(E) What this puniſhment was, is not clearly deſcribed in the text. The literal ſenſe, in the place where he threatens it is, I will threſh your fleſh with thorns of the wilderneſs; and where he executes it, it ſays, that he made them feel the thorns. The antient Jews think, that he cauſed their naked bodies to be flung among thorny buſhes, and to be trampled to death (8). Others think, that he cauſed them to be whipt to death, or to have their fleſh torn with thorns. Others, that they were only chaſtiſed or ſcourged with thorns; but this laſt is ſcarce probable, if we conſider that thoſe of Penuel, who were in the ſame offence, were all put to death.

(7) Judg. viii. 13. (8) Vid. Targ. Jonath. & Munſt in loc.

THE Israelites being thus delivered from their cruel slavery, and loaden with the spoils of their enemies, began to think they could not shew their gratitude to their brave deliverer, nor secure their new-gotten freedom more effectually, than by offering to settle the supreme authority upon him and his posterity; and Gideon, who had threescore and ten sons by several wives, might easily have been tempted to accept it, had he not been so lately convinced, that their greatest security did chiefly depend upon their obedience to their divine protector; he therefore advised them not to put their confidence in their own strength, nor in their general's valour, but in God; and to make sure of his protection by a stricter obedience to his laws. One would hardly think that a speech so full of modesty, piety, and disinterestedness should be the prelude to an action, which sullied both it, and all his other glories; and yet he had no sooner modestly refused their offer, but he desired them, as an acknowledgment of his late services, to present him with what golden ear-rings they had gotten from their enemies. His request was readily complied with, and a garment being spread upon the ground, was presently covered with those ornaments, amounting to 1700 shekels or 850 ounces of gold, besides collars, chains, and other ornaments of the same metal (F), and some purple and other costly garments, of which they had stripped the confederate princes. With these the Jewish general caused an ephod (G) to be made,

(F) We need not wonder at this great quantity of golden plunder, if we remember that all those eastern nations were fond of such ornaments, and that the Midianites in particular not only wore them themselves, but decked the necks of their camels with them, of which they brought vast droves into the field (9).

(G) We have already taken notice of two priestly garments, called by that name from the Hebrew אפד Aphad, to tie, because they were tied about with a girdle; the one was a plain linen vest, such as not only the priests, but even young Samuel wore when he ministred at the altar (10), and David when he marched before the ark (11); the other which was a much richer one, was peculiar to the high-priest. Some learned men have indeed affirmed, though without any foundation, that the Jewish kings were allowed to wear them, when they consulted the Lord by Urim (12); but this we have confuted elsewhere †, so that there can be no ground for supposing, that Gideon had this made for the same end, as being head of Israel; neither indeed could such a garment, how rich soever, made, which he ſet up in his own city Ophrah; and the text adds, that it proved a ſnare both to him and to his houſe, becauſe it became the occaſion of a new kind of idolatry to the Iſraelites. As for Gideon, he returned to his own inheritance, and judged Iſrael forty years; during which none of their enemies dared to moleſt them; and as to the Midianites, they received ſo total an overthrow from him, that they never made any attempt againſt Iſrael from that time. Gideon died in a good old age, and was buried with his anceſtors (H). As for the Iſraelites, whom he left in a peaceful and flouriſhing Year of the Flood, 1763. Year before Chriſt 1236.

(9) Vid. Judg. vii. 12, & Vol. II. p. 122. (10) 1 Sam. ii. 18. (11) 2 Sam. vi. 14. (12) Spencer. tr. de Urim & Thum. Cunæ. Rep. Hebr. l. 1. c. 14. † See before p. 30. not. C.

ver, have taken up ſo great a quantity of gold. Some authors therefore think it to have been an idol (13); others only a kind of trophy, in memory of that ſignal victory (14). Some antient fathers (15), followed by many moderns, believe it to have been ſome ſuch trophy or monument; and add, that it was made in imitation of the complete habit of the high-prieſt, by which he only deſigned to perpetuate the memory of their miraculous deliverance, without dreaming that the Iſraelites would go a whoring after it; ſo that according to them, he was only the innocent cauſe of their idolatry, as Moſes was when he made the braſen ſerpent, which came afterwards to be worſhipped. We need not obſerve the diſparity between theſe two, and that Gideon did that of his own accord, which Moſes was commanded to do, and upon a different account: We ſhall only obſerve, that the words, and it became a מוקש Mokeſh, a ſnare or ſtumbling block to Gideon and his family, ſeem to imply ſomething worſe than a monumental trophy, whatever be meant here by the word Ephod; concerning which we can have nothing certain. This may be one reaſon, though not the only one, why Joſephus has carefully omitted it, as well as that judge's ſeverity againſt the men of Succoth and Penuel (16).

(H) Gideon, being alſo ſurnamed Jerubbaal, is ſuppoſed to be the Jerombal whom Sanchoniatho makes prieſt of the god Jao: but that author's work is now ſo univerſally cried down, as a piece of forgery under his name, and as written on purpoſe to diſcredit the ſacred books of the Jews, that we ſhall lay no other ſtreſs upon this conjecture, than that it proves that the author, whoever he was, had got ſome knowledge of the Jewiſh writings, and did intermix their hiſtory with the antiquities and fables of the Phœnicians (17).

Jerubbaal is by David called Jerubbeſheth (18), becauſe by that time Baal's name was had in horror by the Jews, ſo that in all the names that ended with it, they ſubſtituted that of Boſheth, which ſignifies ſhame; as Iſh-boſheth for Iſh-baal, and the like.

(13) Procop. & al. ap. Toſtat. (14) Catejan. N. Delyr. Jun. Munſt. (15) Auguſt. Theodoret. & al. (16) Vid. Antiq. lib. v. c. 8. (17) de Sanchon. vid. Ant. Vandal. Dupin. Bibliot. Ext. Dodwell Diſſertat. Fabric, Bibl. Græ. Cumberland, Journal de Trevoux, Jan. 1714, & al. (18) 2 Sam. xi. 21.

condition, they forgot both God and him in a very little time. They adopted Baalim, and Baal-berith (I), and other new gods, and repayed Gideon's ſervices with the blackeſt ingratitude. He had left, beſides his other children by his wives, a natural ſon whom he had by a concubine [h]; and he it was who ſucceeded his father by the moſt horrid treachery, even by the deſtruction of his father's whole race.

Abimelech's uſurpation and cruelty

His name was Abimelech: he ſeems to have been a man of a baſe and intriguing genius, full of ambition and cruelty. The firſt ſtep he took after his father's death, was to go to Shechem, where his mother and her kindred dwelt, and to prevail upon them, by their cunning inſinuations, to inſpire the Shechemites with ſome terrible jealouſies againſt the ſons of Gideon. He was indeed ſo far from being able to bribe them with gifts, that he wanted to be aſſiſted by them with money; but he made uſe of other motives equally prevalent, though,

[h] Judg. viii. 31.

(I) We have already mentioned this deity out of biſhop Cumberland from Sanchoniatho, in ſome other parts of this work (19); but it will not be amiſs to ſubjoin to what we have obſerved in the laſt note concerning that ſuppoſed author, that this place is the only one in ſcripture, in which the name of Baal-berith occurs, which ſignifies the Lord of the covenant, and that the ſeptuagint, vulgate, and ſome of the Jewiſh interpreters, render the words not as ours do, they made Baal-berith their god, but bound themſelves to the ſervice of Baal by covenant, or by an oath. It is true, we find in the very next chapter mention made of the houſe or temple of Baal-berith, which was in Shechem; but as every Baal had a kind of a ſurname, as Baal-peor, Baal-zebub, &c. to diſtinguiſh the one from the other, or rather perhaps the Baal of one place from that of another, might not the Shechemites ſurname theirs from the Berith, or covenant, by which they had bound themſelves, and might not the pretended Sanchoniatho from thence make him the Baal-berytos, to make it appear of Phœnician extraction?

For our part, we think the moſt natural etymology the beſt; and that Baal-berith might ſignify the god that preſided over contracts, covenants, and oaths, and puniſhed the breakers of them. It is certain, that the binding the former by the latter was not only a very antient cuſtom, but alſo the greateſt ſecurity that could be inſiſted upon by the parties, which could only be owing to the received notion, that the deity, which was ſo ſolemny called as a witneſs to them, was bound in juſtice to puniſh the breach of them. Hence came the Jupiter the Witneſs, or the faithful of the Greeks and Romans.

(19) See Vol. I. p. 298. not. H. & Vol. II. p. 305, & alib.

it

it is likely, promiſes were not wanting to draw them to his party. What he moſtly inſiſted upon was, whether it were better for Iſrael to have one maſter or ſeventy, and whether it were more for the intereſts of the Shechemites to have their city, or that of Ophrah, to be the ſeat of the ſupreme judge? By theſe and ſuch like inſinuations, he obtained from them a ſum of ſeventy ſhekels of gold, out of the treaſury of Baal-berith, with which he hired a number of profligate fellows, capable of the wickedeſt enterpriſe, and led them directly to Ophrah, where having ſurpriſed his brethren, the ſeventy ſons of Gideon, he murdered them all, except the youngeſt, upon the ſpot. This unnatural fratricide, which ought to have made him abhorred by all men, but eſpecially by thoſe who had the leaſt grateful remembrance of Gideon, did immediately bring all the Shechemites, and thoſe of Millo, into his intereſt, who went and proclaimed him king, in ſome conſpicuous part of the plain of Shechem (K), in hopes that all the reſt of the nation would follow their example.

In the interim Jotham, the only ſurviving ſon of Gideon, took that time to get upon mount Gerizim, which was near the place of this tumultuous aſſembly, and being within their hearing, and out of their reach, made uſe of the following pathetic apologue, to diſſuade them from their raſh and unjuſt enterpriſe [i]; The trees, once upon a time, aſſembled to make choice of a king: they offered that dignity to the olive-tree, which anſwered, that it could by no means diveſt itſelf of its oil

[i] Judg. ix. ver. 7. ad. 21.

(K) The original has אלון מוצב אשר בשכם Alon Mutzab Aſher be-Shechem, the oak of the ſtatue, or pillar, that is in the territory of Shechem. The Hebrews however tranſlate Alon a plain in ſtead of an oak, and affirm that there was ſome ſtatue or pillar erected in it (20). It is plain, that there was both an oak and a ſtatue, or monument, and that the latter was erected by Joſhua, a little before his death, in memory of the new covenant which the Iſraelites had made with God at that place (21); ſo that it ſeems to be thus circumſtantially recorded to aggravate the crime of the Shechemites, in chooſing ſo remarkable and ſacred a ſpot of ground, to be the ſcene of their tumultuous aſſembly, and unlawful election.

As for the houſe of Millo, which joined with the Shechemites, it is ſuppoſed to have been all the kindred of Abimelech's mother, whom Joſephus calls Druma (22), and Millo himſelf is ſuppoſed to have been her father. The ſeptuagint and vulgate do render it the city of Millo, but we do not read of any city of that name in all the land of Paleſtine.

(20) Vid. Munſt. in loc. (21) Joſh. xxiv. 26. (22) Ant. l 5. c. 9.

and

and fatneſs, ſo acceptable to God and man, to reign over them; they then invited the fig-tree, which did alſo refuſe them on account of its ſweetneſs; the vine being applied to, preferred her juice, which affords gladneſs to gods and men, to the empire over them. At length the bramble, being invited to accept of that dignity, anſwered that if they really meant to make him king over them, they ſhould come and ſhelter themſelves under its ſhadow, if not, let fire come out of the bramble and devour the cedars of Lebanon.

HIS deſign was plainly to inſinuate, that the happineſs of a private life was ſo far preferable to the cares that attend on the ſupreme authority, that the perſon who exchanged the one for the other, muſt either do it from a generous deſire of ſerving his country, or from a baſe one to enſlave it. Some interpreters ſuppoſe, that by the olive, the fig-tree, and the vine, he alluded to Othniel, Deborah, and Gideon, who were with difficulty prevailed upon to accept of the dignity of judge, and refuſed to have it entailed on their poſterity [k]; but whether it be ſo or not, it is plain from his own application, that the bramble alluded to the traitor Abimelech, who was ſo far from being able to protect the Shechemites, that he muſt unavoidably prove the occaſion of a bloody war, which like a conſuming fire would end in their utter ruin: For, added he, I appeal to you, whether your choice of Abimelech, preferably to any of the ſons of Gideon, your late benefactor and deliverer, be either grateful or juſt? or rather indeed whether the murdering of all his children, for the ſake of the ſon of a ſlave, be not an inſtance of the blackeſt cruelty and ingratitude? if you think it is not, I wiſh you joy of your new king, and him of his new dignity; but if it is, may he prove a curſe to Shechem and Millo, and you to him (L).

AFTER

[k] N. DE LYR. & al.

(L) We cannot forbear obſerving here, that this is the firſt inſtance we have of this way of ſpeaking by parables. We do not indeed take upon us to attribute the invention of it to the Hebrews, becauſe we do not know how far they might have learnt it elſewhere; though if that were the caſe, one may juſtly wonder, that Moſes, who was ſo well verſed in all the learning of his time, and had ſo much occaſion for this excellent way of inſtructing and reproving his ſtubborn and rebellious nation, ſhould yet never make uſe of it in all the forty years of his being their leader. Not that it was not in uſe by other nations in his time, ſince he mentions thoſe who record the overthrow of Sihon and of his metropolis in Proverbs, and Balaam uttering his prophecies in ſome ſuch proverbial

AFTER ſo bold and ſevere a ſpeech, Jotham did not think it adviſeable to expoſe himſelf to Abimelech's reſentment, but fled to Beer, a city in the tribe of Judah not far from Jebus, or Jeruſalem, where he continued all the time of his reign, which according to his prediction, proved both thorny and ſhort-lived; for beſides his mortification in not being acknowledged bial ſpeeches *. But if we may judge of them at this diſtance, by the ſhort ſpecimen he has given us of them, they were, if not crude and uncouth, at leaſt vaſtly inferior in elegance and energy to this of Jotham, and others which were uſed by the Jews; ſo that theſe may be juſtly ſaid at leaſt to have been the improvers, or rather perfecters of this parabolic way. But be that as it will, nothing is more palpable than the vanity of the Greeks, who boaſt themſelves the authors of it, when it was in greater perfection among the Jews, before they were civilized from the loweſt degree of ignorance and barbarity, than ever they raiſed it to, after they had arrived to the greateſt pitch of polite learning; an evident proof of which we have not only in this ſpeech of Jotham, but in that excellent one, by which the prophet Nathan made David pronounce a ſevere ſentence of condemnation againſt himſelf, for a crime, which it would have been dangerous ſo much as to have mentioned in any other way (23). We find it alſo frequently uſed, not by prophets only, but by courtiers, politicians, and ſoldiers, (24) in the old teſtament, and by our Saviour in the new.

And here we beg leave to vindicate our divine Maſter from a moſt unnatural and unjuſt expreſſion, which not only ours, but moſt verſions make him frequently uſe, that he ſpake to the people in parables, that ſeeing they might not perceive, and hearing they might not underſtand, leſt they ſhould be converted and be ſaved—becauſe Iſaiah had ſaid, He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts leſt they ſhould ſee—and underſtand, and be converted, and I ſhould heal them (25). The momentouſneſs of the ſubject will, we hope, atone for the length of the note, ſince ſuch expreſſions can hardly be read without horror, or at leaſt without conceiving ſome very unworthy ideas, both of the Godhead and of that compaſſionate Redeemer, who ſo often bewailed, even with tears, their ſtupidity and hardneſs of heart: What part muſt he be ſuppoſed to have acted, who could expreſs ſo much concern at their unbelief, if his deſign were to confirm them in it? To what purpoſe was his three years preaching to them, and his reproving them for their ſlowneſs of belief, if his unintelligible way of ſpeaking made it unavoidable to them?

We need not obſerve here, how contrary this was likewiſe to the nature and deſign of parables, which is to reach down to the mean-

* Vid. Num. xxi. 27, & ſeq. xxiii. 7, & ſeq. (23) 2 Sam. xii. 1, & ſeq. (24) Ibid. xiv. 1, & ſeq. 1 King. xx. 38, & ſeq. xxii. 19, & alib. (25) Matth. xiii. 13, & ſeq. Mark iv. 11, & alib.

eſt

ledged by any of the tribes, the text says, that God sent an evil spirit, that is, caused a spirit of jealousy to be sown between the Shechemites and him, which ended in a full resolution to expiate their folly by his death. But God suffered him to escape for the present, that he might shortly become the instrument of a more severe chastisement against them.

Abimelech fifth judge.

Gaal,

est capacities, by borrowing such examples and expressions, as are best understood by them; at least it is certain, that all those which our Saviour used were of this kind, whatever those of the Egyptians, Pythagoreans, and other philosophers might be. So that it is absurd to suppose, that he would have made choice of such a plain and simple way of teaching, if his design had been to have confirmed them in their ignorance; neither need we say how opposite it is to his professed design of coming into the world to save sinners, that none might perish but have eternal life, nor of his working so many miracles, to give the greater sanction to his doctrine.

We have already observed, that the writers of the New Testament did constantly quote the septuagint version (26), which had translated that passage of Isaiah, and many others of the like nature, in an active sense, which, in the original, implied only a bare permission; and it plainly appears, that both our Saviour and his apostles never understood them in any other sense, from that petition, lead us not into temptation (27), and that exposition of St. James, Let no man say that he is tempted of God, for God tempteth no man (28). We may further observe, that whatever language they spoke, they still intermixed the Hebrew or Syriac phrase with it, so that the Greek of the New Testament is best explained either by itself, or by the Syriac idiom.

Now if we seek from either of these for the true meaning of the text in question, that seeing they might not see, &c. we shall find that the particle, which some of the evangelists render by ἵνα and we by to the end that, is not only capable of several other senses less opposite to the nature of parables, and the design of the gospel, such as though, so as, wherefore, and the like (29); but even of such a one as is exactly agreeable to it, and that it may and ought properly to be rendered, because seeing they do not see, and hearing they do not understand; so that their gross and carnal understanding required the plainest preaching. And if this were the case, we hope any impartial reader will rather think that they used it in this sense, than in that absurd one which the versions give it. The only two particles which both the Hebrew and its derivatives have to express ἵνα or to the end that, is either כי Ki, or למען Lemaban; and both do equally signify because, wherefore, and the like, and (26) See Vol. II. p. 508, not. (D) & p. 549. sub. fin. not. (X).

(27) Matt. vi. 13. (28) Jam. i. 13. (29) Vid. Le Scene. Essay on a new vers p. ii, Ch. 5.

nothing

I

Gaal, informed of the hatred which they had conceived againſt their new-made king, came to Shechem, with a full deſign to blow it into an open rupture, but Zebul, whom Abimelech had intruſted with the government of that city, a fit ſervant for ſuch a maſter, failed not to acquaint him with it, whilſt, in outward appearance, he ſided with Gaal and his party. At length, after ſeveral bickerings on both ſides, Gaal perceived Abimelech marching towards the town, and went out with his men to oppoſe him, but was repulſed; and when he would have re-entered into Shechem, Zebul drove him back. What became of him and his party, the text doth not ſay, but upon Abimelech's entering the town, the frighted inhabitants retired into the temple of Baal-berith, as into a ſanctuary, where they were ſoon made ſenſible, to their coſt, what a god they had preferred to that of Iſrael. Abimelech commanded a party of men to follow his ſteps into the next wood, where every one after his example, cut down a bough of a tree, and having piled them round the temple and ſet fire to them, they were all ſmothered to death, being about a thouſand men and women. He then cauſed the city and nothing but the analogy of the context can fix it; but the tranſlators have often fallen upon the wrong. As to the firſt, they have rendered it becauſe, where it plainly ſignifies though, or wherefore, as where it is ſaid that Eli's ſons did not hearken to him, becauſe [inſtead of wherefore] it pleaſed the Lord to ſlay them (30); for it were blaſphemy to ſuppoſe, that God did force them to diſobedience that he might deſtroy them for it. As for the ſecond, it is plain to all that have any knowledge of thoſe tongues, that it ſignifies as often becauſe as to the end that; and here we need not quote the authority of lexicons, or parallels, ſince St. Matthew tranſlates it here ὅτι becauſe, where the others render it ἵνα that. To his diſciples therefore, whoſe heart had been already prepared for the more ſublime truths of the goſpel, Chriſt ſays, it was given to underſtand the myſteries of the kingdom of heaven; but to the reſt whoſe hearts were ſtill groſs, carnal, and incapable of them, he ſpake in parables, that is, as our Dr. Sam. Clarke obſerves (31), in ſuch a way as beſt ſuited their capacity, was moſt taking with, and profitable to them, becauſe, as he elſewhere has it (32), parables are examples, or compariſons taken from things known and familiar, and are here put in oppoſition to myſteries, or truths of a ſuperior nature. The reader may ſee this point more fully demonſtrated by the authors above quoted, and many more (33).

(30) 1 Sam. ii. 25. Vid. de part. Ki. Buxtorf Lexic. Hebr Nold. Concord. part. Heb. Worſt. Alſtad. Amami. & al. (31) in Mark iv. 33. (32) in Mark iii. (33) Vid. Le Scon. Eſſay ub. ſup. Whitby, Pelling. & al.

tower to be razed to the ground, and to be ſtrewed with ſalt; and thus was the firſt part of Jotham's prophecy fulfilled, and the fire from the bramble burnt up the cedars of Lebanon.

THE next part followed ſoon after, and Abimelech, flushed with his ſucceſs, marched againſt Thebez, a city of Judah, which had alſo taken up arms againſt him, and there met with an ignominious death, where he expected a new conqueſt. The citizens, repulſed by his victorious troops, retired into a tower, where he thought to have burnt them alive, when a woman flung down a ſtone, which lighted upon his head, and delivered her people from his fury. Abimelech, finding death approaching, and being more aſhamed of the hand that gave it, than of his own fratricides and tyranny, choſe rather to die a ſecond death, than to fall by the hands of a woman, and commanded his ſervant Zebul to diſpatch him, which he immediately did [l]. This was the exemplary end of Abimelech, whoſe ambition made him aſpire to a dignity, which has juſtly branded his memory, and ſullied the liſt of the judges; he being the only one that uſurped and abuſed that dignity. It laſted about three years, after which God made choice of a more worthy one to ſucceed him.

Tola, ſeventh judge.

Tola, the ſon of Puah, the ſon of Dodo (M), of the tribe of Iſſachar. The text mentions nothing particularly of him, except that he dwelt at Shamir upon mount Ephraim, where he was buried, after he had judged Iſrael twenty three years [m].

HE was ſucceeded by Jair, a wealthy man, of that part of the tribe of Manaſſeh which dwelt on the other ſide of Jordan, and poſſeſſed a vaſt territory in the land of Gilead, in which were thirty cities, which he gave to his thirty ſons; whence they were called Havoth, or hamlets of Jair [n]. He judged Iſrael twenty two years, and was buried in the city of Camon in the ſame land. The text adds, as a then mark of their wealth and greatneſs, that they all rode upon aſſe [l] Judg. ix. 4. [m] Ibid. x. 1, 2. [n] Judg. x. vid. & Num. xxxii. 41. Deut. iii. 14.

(M) The Greek and Latin verſions take the word Dodo, not as a proper name, but in a grammatical ſenſe, and from דוד Dod, uncle, with the ו affixed, and render it his uncle, meaning Abimelech's, mentioned in the beginning of the verſe, whence they ſuppoſe Tola's father to have been Gideon's brother. The Hebrew indeed will bear them out in it; but there is one difficulty againſt them, namely that Gideon was of the tribe of Manaſſeh, and Puah of that of Iſſachar; ſo that they could at the beſt be but uterine brothers nor even ſo without ſuppoſing, that their mother had married firſt in one tribe, and then in the other.

colts;

colts; which is likewiſe obſerved of ſeveral others in the ſame book [o].

THE ungrateful Iſraelites returned ſoon after to their idolatry, and even multiplied the number of their gods, which brought a fifth thraldom upon them of eighteen years, under the Philiſtines and Ammonites. Here they had recourſe again to prayer and profeſſions of repentance; but they were bid to go and cry to thoſe deities they had adopted, for deliverance. This anſwer, and the preſſing danger they were in from the Ammonites, who had already paſſed the Jordan, and were going to fall upon Judah and Benjamin [p], brought them to ſuch a ſenſe of their folly, that they put away all their ſtrange gods, and began to ſerve the Lord in earneſt; upon which God was pleaſed to give them a promiſe, that they ſhould be ſpeedily delivered. They aſſembled themſelves at Mizpeh, to ſtop the career of the children of Ammon; but as God had not now nominated a judge or general, as at other times, they found themſelves at a loſs for an experienced leader; and not finding one among them, either that would take that charge upon him, or whom they dared to intruſt with the command of their army, they were forced to ſend an invitation to the valiant Jephthah to accept of it, and with it of the place of judge or general during his life.

Jephthah was the ſon of Gilead, but by a concubine, for which reaſon he was thruſt out by his brethren, whom his father had by a lawful wife, and forced to retire into the land of Tob (N), where he became chief of a band of fugitives and idle perſons, and ſignalized himſelf more by his valour than by his honeſty; he therefore received their meſſage with ſome miſtruſt, and did not accept of their offered dignity, till it was confirmed to him by an oath [q]. As ſoon as he had Jephthah.

[o] Vid. Judg. v. 10. [p] Ibid. x. 9. [q] Ibid. xi. 10.

(N) This land is on the moſt northern part of Manaſſeh's lot on the other ſide of Jordan. It is called Toby, and its inhabitants Tobinians, or Tubinians, in the firſt and ſecond books of the Maccabees (34). As for Jephthah's brethren driving him out of the inheritance, he could not juſtly complain of it, becauſe it paſſed into a conſtant law ever ſince Abraham's time, and was founded on the command which God gave him, to caſt out the ſon of the concubine (35).

(34) 1 Macc. v. 13. 2 Macc. xii. 17. (35) Gen. xxi. 10. & ſeq.

put himself at their head, he sent an expostulatory message to the Ammonites †; but finding them stiffly bent upon conquest, rather than parley, he ran over the land of Gilead and Manasseh; and having got a sufficient army, marched directly against them. Before he ventured to engage them, either his fear or superstition put a strange expedient into his head, to make sure of the divine assistance: he made a vow that if God would but bless him with an entire victory, he would sacrifice to him the first living creature that came out of his house to meet him at his return; and this inconsiderate promise robbed him at once of the glory and pleasure of the ensuing action. The Ammonites were indeed totally defeated, and the Israelites laden with their spoil, as we have seen above; but his daughter, a virgin and his only child, and, if we may credit the Jews, a person of exquisite beauty and virtue, proved the unhappy victim of his rash vow. The welcome news of her father's success had brought her out, at the head of a company of maidens, to congratulate him with timbrels, and dances, and other expressions of filial joy; so that she proved the unhappy object upon which he cast his eyes, and which he had vowed to destruction. As soon as he saw her, he rent his cloaths, and disclosed the secret to her, with most lively expressions of grief. She heard it with a constancy, which one would hardly have expected in a person of her tender years, and only begged for a respite of two months, during which she would retire with some of her companions into the mountains, to bewail her virginity, it being esteemed a great misfortune for a daughter of Israel to die unmarried. Her request being granted, she absented herself during that short space, and, at the end of it, returned to her father, who did to her according to his vow; that is, according to the generality of Jewish and Christian interpreters [r], he offered her up for a burnt-offering: from which came that custom mentioned in the text, for the daughters of Israel to go yearly to lament Jephthah's daughter four days in a year [s]; or, according to others, he consecrated her to God, and condemned her to perpetual virginity; so that those yearly visits were

His rash vow.

† See Vol. II. p. 102. [r] JOSEPH. Antiq. lib. v. c. 9. RABBIN. ser omn. Chald. paraph. Jonath. in loc. JUST. MART. AMBROS. de off. l. iii. c. 12. HIERON. cont. Jovinian. lib. i. & alib. AUGUST. quæst. in judic. 49. CHRYSOST. homil. 14. ad pop. Antioch. THEODORET. quæst. in judic. 20. SERAR. SALIAN. GENEBRARD. CAJÉT. & al. mult. vid. & LUD. CAPPELL. & D. CALMET. dissertat. de vot. Jeph. [s] JUDG. xi. ver. ult.

payed

payed to her, as compliments of condolence for it, as ſhe was the daughter of an Iſraelitiſh judge[t] (O).

THIS

[t] PAGNIN. ARR. MONTAN. TREMEL. MUNST. DRUS. GROT. N. DE LYR. & al. in loc. LE SCEN. Eſſay on a new verſ. ch. vii.

(O) It will ſcarcely be doubted, that the fable of the ſacrifice of Iphigenia had its birth from this; eſpecially if we remember that the taking of Troy happened ſoon after the time of Jephthah. There is indeed this difference, that ſome of the wiſer heathen authors who relate it, have introduced the goddeſs Diana interpoſing herſelf to prevent ſo horrid a ſacrifice being offered to her; whilſt the far greater part of the Jews, even Joſephus, Philo, and the Chaldee paraphraſt, acknowledge Jephthah to have been ſuffered by God, by the high-prieſt, and the whole people, to offer the fruit of his own body, an innocent young virgin, an only child, and a dear and dutiful one, the only object of his preſent comfort and future hopes, in a burnt-offering unto the Lord, who had ſo often declared his utter abhorrence againſt all ſuch abominations, and rejected the Canaanites upon that very account. Some even add, that her life was ſacrificed rather to a punctilio of honour, her father thinking it beneath him to go to the high-prieſt, to be abſolved from his unlawful vow; and the latter being above doing of it, unleſs he were applied to by him. It ſeems indeed wonderful, that ſo many of the antient fathers have too implicity followed the Jews, in believing that ſhe was really ſacrificed, notwithſtanding the apoſtle to the Hebrews ranking Jephthah among the faithful Jewiſh worthies. But here it muſt be remembered, that they had no means of being ſet right, for want of being acquainted with the original, and conſequently of knowing that the text was capable of two different ſenſes, and that the Jews had choſen the leaſt reaſonable of the two. But what is moſt ſurpriſing of all is, that ſo many learned interpreters ſhould ſtill adhere to it, ſince a better underſtanding of that tongue has opened the way to the other ſenſe, which is moſt agreeable both to reaſon and to the tenor of ſcripture. However, as what has been urged on both ſides of the queſtion is too copious, and would ſwell this note too much, to give our readers even a ſhort abſtract of it; we chooſe to refer them to thoſe learned moderns, who have wrote on that ſubject (36), while we content ourſelves with juſtifying the latter ſenſe, as far as the original will bear us out in it. For we doubt not, but if we make it appear to be capable of it, our readers will readily abſolve the Hebrew judge from ſo horrid and unnatural a ſacrifice under pretence of religion, though contrary to, and plainly forbidden by it, even when the text expreſly ſays, that the ſpirit of God came upon him about the time when he made this vow, (37); rather than to fancy, with some of the fathers (38), that God suffered him to offer up his daughter in the strictest sense, to deter men for the future from making any such rash vows. What has misled all the antient fathers is, that the Septuagint and the Vulgate render the words of Jephthah, whatsoever cometh forth to meet me, in the masculine, as if he had said, whosoever, or what person soever, cometh forth; whereas the original is here undeterminate. Again, they did not know that the particle Vau may be properly enough taken in the disjunctive sense, or, instead of the conjunctive, and. This is what some judicious critics, both Jews and Christians, have since clearly shewn to be the right signification, both here and elsewhere (39). So that Jephthah's words should be rendered shall surely be the Lord's, or, not, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering; that is, if it be a human creature, he or she shall be consecrated to the service of God, as some sort of Nazarites were *; or if a beast, it shall be offered up for a burnt-offering, if it be fit for it, or if not, be exchanged for another that is so. What confirms this sense of the vow is, 1. That there were but three sorts of creatures that could be fit for a burnt-offering, according to the Mosaic law; whereas any other creature might as well chance to come out of his doors, as any of these three. 2. It might chance to be an unclean one, such as a dog, an ass, or a hog; which could not be in any way offered to the Lord, but must be exchanged or redeemed. 3. That human sacrifices of any kind, except what was vowed to extermination of the nations condemned by God to it †, (and these could not be said to be offered up in burnt-offerings) were expressly forbidden (40). And, 4. That there was an express redemption for vows relating to human creatures, and the price of it appointed by God (41).

(36) Vid. Pagnin. Montan. Munſt. Vatabl. Druſ. Grot. Cleric. Lyran. Marian. Cappel. Marſham. Canon Ægypt. ſec. ix. § 3. Saubert. de ſacrific. c. 21. Sobed. de diis German. lib. 2. & al. mult.

about

THIS dear-bought victory was like to have proved fatal to him from another quarter, which he had no reason to expect it

It were therefore absurd to suppose, either that Jephthah would have vowed to offer the first creature indifferently that came out of his house, a burnt-offering unto God, without distinction of clean and unclean, fit and unfit, or if he had, that the priests would have suffered him to put it in execution, when the victim vowed proved an unlawful and redeemable one, and would have been an abomination to God, as well as a scandal to all the world. For these plain reasons we think, with those learned men above quoted,

(37) Judg. xi. 29. (38) Vid. int. al. Chrysost. Homil. ad pop. Antioch. xiv. Justin. Mart. Theodoret, qu. xx. in Judic. (39) Vid. Jos & Dav. Kimchi. R. Levi. Ben Gers. Salom. Ben Melech. & auct. Christ. sup. citat. * See before p. 229, 230. † See before p. 227. & seq. (40) Deut. xii. 31. & alib. (41) Levit. xxvii. 1. & seq.

that

it from. He was ſcarce returned to his own houſe, when the

that the words ought rather to have been rendered thus: Then the ſpirit of God came upon Jephthah——and he vowed a vow unto the Lord, and ſaid, If thou ſhalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hands, it ſhall be, that whatſoever cometh forth of the doors of my houſe, to meet me when I return in peace,—ſhall ſurely be the LORD's, or I will offer it up for a burnt-offering.—And Jephthah came to Mizpeh to his houſe, and his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and dances, and ſhe was his only child.—And when he ſaw her he rent his cloaths, and ſaid, alas, my daughter, thou haſt brought me very low, thou art one of thoſe that trouble me; for I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back.—And ſhe ſaid unto him, If thou haſt opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to thy vow——only let this thing be done for me; let me——bewail my virginity two months. And it came to paſs at the end of two months, that ſhe returned to her father who did with her according to his vow, and ſhe never knew man; that is, ſhe continued a virgin. And it became a ſtatute or cuſtom in Iſrael, that the daughters of Iſrael came four days in the year לתנות Lethanoth, to condole or converſe with the daughter of Jephthah.—

Here then Jephthah's vow is taken in the firſt ſenſe, ſhall be the LORD'S; that is, the vowed thing, proving to be his only daughter, he conſecrated her to the ſervice of God. For this reaſon it is added, ודיא לא ידעה איש Vebi lo yadhah iſh, and ſo ſhe did not know man; that is, from that time to her death. For it would have been ſuperfluous to have added that circumſtance, if he had ſacrificed her as ſoon as ſhe came from bewailing her virginity. As for the verb תנה Thanah, which ſo many verſions render to bewail, were it capable of no other ſignification, yet would it not imply the bewailing of her death, but her being condemned to perpetual virginity, which was reckoned one of the greateſt misfortunes that could happen to an Iſraelitiſh maid. But it is plain, that it ſignifies alſo to condole, to converſe with, to declare or extol. In this laſt ſenſe the reader will find it uſed in the ſame book, chap. v. ver. 11. where it is ſaid that they יתנן Jithnu ſhall rehearſe, or extol the righteous acts of the LORD. So that here the Iſraelitiſh maids might go, either to condole her for being ſecluded from man, or to extol her piety and conſtancy in ratifying her father's vow.

There are but two things objected againſt this ſenſe of the text; the firſt is, that the Moſaic law did not allow parents a power to oblige their children to a ſingle life. But, beſides that the argument is much ſtronger againſt their power of ſacrificing them to the flames, we find that the children, when of age, might conſent to the vow; and this ſeems to be the reaſon why the text adds, that ſhe readily ratified it (42). But it is plain moreover that parents had a very great power, to impoſe ſevere and grating laws, not only on their children, but alſo on their poſterity; as when the ſon of Rechab forbid all his deſcendants the drinking of wine, dwelling in houſes, and the like (43). Though were it not ſo, one could only ſay, that Jephthah, as a judge, ſtretched his power beyond what he might do as a father, though without ſuch a degree of barbarity, as if he had offered her up in the other ſenſe.

(42) Judg. xi. 36. vid. & Num. xxx. paſſ.

only

the turbulent Ephraimites furrounded it, and in a tumultuous manner

The next thing that is objected is, that the grief, which Jephthah expreſſed at the ſight of his daughter, ſeems to imply ſome heavier fate, than a bare doom to perpetual virginity. But it ought to be remembered, that he thereby deprived an only child, and a dear one, of the greateſt happineſs of life; for ſuch was marriage, eſpecially when bleſſed with children, eſteemed in Iſrael; and himſelf of all hopes of any poſterity. Where is then the wonder that he ſhould uſe ſuch expreſſions of grief, when his only child was condemned to ſuch a reproachful and uncomfortable life, and himſelf excluded thereby from the proſpect of having the Meſſiah to come of his ſeed (44)?

Since then the original is capable of ſo much fairer and more natural a ſenſe, it were abſurd to prefer the other, which is both contrary to reaſon, nature, the Moſaic law, and the analogy of faith; and has been the ſource of endleſs diſputes and ſuperfluous inquiries, how far this inhuman ſacrifice was, or was not, juſtifiable, commendable, and pleaſing to God; and how far Jephthah's barbarous faith intitled him to be ranked among the Hebrew worthies (45). Concerning all which, the reader may conſult thoſe antient fathers above quoted, and ſeveral others (46); for whom there is only this to be ſaid, that they had no verſion, but the Greek and Latin to ſteer by, backed with the teſtimony of the antient Jews. A late commentator (47), however has ſince endeavoured to vindicate the notion of Jephthah's daughter being really ſacrificed according to the letter, and the opinion of the fathers; though without pretending to juſtify, either the vow, or the execution of it. In order to which, he inſiſts ſtrenuouſly, 1. that he did not vow the firſt thing, but the firſt perſon that came out of his houſe. But we have already proved the contrary above; and it is a wonder, that he, who ſeems well verſed in the Hebrew, ſhould not have been ſenſible of it. He next inſiſts upon an expreſs text in the law concerning vows (48), that whatſoever is vowed unto the Lord of men, ſhall not be redeemed, but ſhall manner threatened to ſet it on fire, and to burn him and all he had, for having dared to engage the Ammonites, without ſummoning them to arms. Jephthah who was not of ſo gentle a diſpoſition as his predeceſſor Gideon, did not think it worth the while to ſooth their pride with a flattering ſpeech; on the contrary, he upbraided them with their baſeneſs, in not anſwering his ſummons, and leaving him to bear the brunt of the enemy. Theſe reproaches ſtung them ſo to the quick, that they ſcrupled not, in the height of their reſentment, to call the Gileadites a pack of ſpurious fugitives, a kind of mongrels, between Ephraim and Manaſſeh. There wanted nothing more to exaſperate the Gileadites, who were of that half tribe of Manaſſeh, which was ſeated on the other ſide of Jordan. A bloody fight enſued, in which thoſe of Ephraim were diſcomfited with a great loſs, and the Gileadites, having ſeized the fords of Jordan, ſuffered none of thoſe who had eſcaped from the ſlaughter to live. Their method was, to examine all that offered to croſs that river whether they were Ephraimites; which was eaſily done, by making them pronounce the word SHIBBOLETH; which ſignifies an ear of corn, and which thoſe of that tribe were known to pronounce SIBBOLETH; ſo that as many as were caught by that ſnare, were immediately knocked on the head; ſurely be put to death. But if this be the purport of that command, there is at once an end of all enquiry, concerning the lawfulneſs both of Jephthah's vow, and of all other human ſacrifices. Had our author conſulted the learned Selden (49), he would have found it fully proved, not only againſt Cappellus and others, that the parents had no ſuch power over their children, but even againſt the Jews, that maſters had it not over their ſlaves; and that the queſtion in this law is not about things, or men, vowed for burnt-offerings, which was abſolutely forbidden, but about ſuch as were devoted by חרם Cherem, Anathema, to utter extermination, of which kind were the inhabitants, and all the plunder of Jericho (50), of the Amalekites, of king Arad and his people, of the inhabitants of Jabeſh-gilead (51), and of the ſeven nations of Canaan. But of this Cherem we have had occaſion to ſpeak already, and ſhall dwell no longer upon it †. It is plain therefore, that theſe two places are nothing to our author's purpoſe, and that the whole tenor of the ſcriptures is againſt it; ſo that we ſee no reaſon to depart from the contrary opinion.

(43) Vid. Jerem. xxxv. 6. & ſeq. (44) Vid. Le Scen. Eſſay on a new verſ. ch. vii § 9. (45) Hebr. xi. 32. (46) Vid. Auguſt. quæſt. 49. in Judic. Hieron. lib. i. cont. Jovinian. & Epiſt. ad Julian. Ambroſ. lib. iii. de offic. c. 12. Th. Aquin. ſecund. § 2. qu. 88. (47) Calmet. Diſſert. de vot. Jeph. comm. in Judic. & Dict. ſub voc. Jephte. (48) Levit. xxvii. 29.

(49) De Jur. Nat. & Gent. ſec. diſcipl Heb. c. 4. & ſeq. (50) Joſh. vi. paſſ. & alib. (51) Num. xxi. 2. Judg. xxi. 9. 10.
† See before p. 226. vid. & Seld. ubi ſup. Patric. Grot. Le Clerc. & al. in Levit. xxvii. 28. 29.

and this unhappy contention occasioned the loss of 42,000 Ephraimites. As for Jephthah, we read no more of him, except that he judged Israel six years; by which is only meant, that part of it which was on the other side of Jordan; and that he was buried in (one of) the cities of Gilead [u]. This has given birth to two Jewish fables, very opposite to one another; the first is, that he was smitten with a sore disease, as a punishment for his impious vow, which rotted all his limbs one after another; so that there was hardly one city in the land of Gilead in which he did not drop one of them. The other is, that the Gileadites, in memory of the great deliverance they obtained by him, dissected his body, that every city might have some part, to keep as a monument of it [w].

Ibzan. Jephthah was succeeded by Ibzan, whom the Jewish rabbies will have to be the same with Boaz, who married Ruth the Moabitess [x], but without any foundation. This was their 10th judge, a native of Bethlehem; but whether that which belonged to the tribe of Zebulun [y], or that which belonged to that of Judah, is not certain. He is only recorded for his numerous posterity, namely, thirty sons and as many daughters, whom he lived to see all married; so that he had 120 sons and daughters, and sons and daughters-in-law, besides grandchildren. This was looked upon as a great blessing in Israel. He judged seven years [z], and was succeeded by Elon. Elon, of the tribe of Zebulun, who judged Israel ten years [a]. He was buried in Ajalon, in his own tribe, and succeeded by Abdon. Abdon, who was the son of Hillel, of the tribe of Ephraim, and native of Pirathon in the mount of the Amalekites in the same tribe, where he was buried, after having judged Israel eight years. He is recorded for his numerous issue, having left behind him forty sons and thirty grandsons, who rode on as many ass-colts, after the manner of the great men in Israel [b].

WE read of no slavery, war, or defection, during the life of these three last judges; whether it were that the swords of Gideon and Jephthah had too far weakened their enemies, or that their own valour did both intimidate them, and keep the Israelites from running into those idolatries, which were attended tended with the loſs of peace and liberty. The latter ſeems indeed the moſt probable, becauſe we find, that after the death of the laſt of theſe, they relapſed and ſuffered a heavy yoke of forty years under the Philiſtines c.

[u] Judg. xii. 7. [w] Vid. MUNST. in loc. [x] Ruth iv. 8. & seq. Matth. i. 5. vid. MUNST. in Judg. xii. 8. [y] Josh. xix. 15. [z] Judg. xii. 8. & seq. [a] Ibid. ver. 11. [b] Ibid. ver. 13, 14.

THIS ſixth ſlavery began about the ſeventh month after Eli joined, in his own perſon, the dignity of judge to that of high-prieſt d. He was of the family of Ithamar, the younger branch of Aaron's houſe; and the high-prieſthood had been tranſlated into it from the elder one of Eleazar (P). It is indeed ſurpriſing, that the people ſhould have continued ſo long free from defection, during the lives of their lay-judges, and fall into idolatry under the government of an high-prieſt. But Eli is particularly recorded for his indolence and remiſſneſs, eſpecially towards his two ſons, whom he ſuffered to run into the greateſt exceſſes of debauchery and irreligion, to the great ſcandal of all Iſrael e. However he was the only ruler the Iſraelites had during this long thraldom; and ſeems to have been choſen by God, as the propereſt judge for them at that time; for as he was known to be incapable of undertaking any thing for their deliverance, he was the fitteſt to withdraw their uſual confidence in an arm of fleſh, and to make them look up to heaven for relief. Accordingly, when the ſeverity of their thraldom had brought them to a better ſenſe, GOD ſent them a deliverer, who was altogether wonderful from his conception to his death.

c Judg. xiii. 1. d Vid. USSER. Ann. ſub A. M. 2848. and the chronolog. index at the end of our Bibles. Year before Chriſt 1156. e 1 Sam. ii. 12. & ſeq.

(P) This thraldom is computed by the chronologers cited above, not to have ended till ſeven months after Eli's death, when the ark was brought back from the land of the Philiſtines.

We have already ſpoken in another place ‡ of this tranſlation of the high-prieſthood, from the elder to the younger branch of Aaron's family. We need only take notice here, that though we find no mention of any other high-prieſt of the elder branch from Joſhua to Samſon, that is during 300 years, except Phinehas the ſon of Eleazar; yet the book of the Chronicles mentions (52) three others, namely, Abiſhua, Bukki, and Uzzi; called by Joſephus (53), Ahiezer, Boccejas, and Ozies. It is uncertain how long any of them lived; but by the dignity being transferred to Eli about the year before Chriſt 1156, it is reaſonably ſuppoſed to have paſſed from Uzzi to him, rather than from his ſon Meraioth.

‡ See before, p. 234. not. (8). (52) 1 Chron. vi. 4, 5, & 50. (53) Ant. lib. 5. c. ult.

Samſon. HE was the miraculous ſon of old age and barrenneſs. His birth and proweſs had been foretold by an angel, firſt to his mother, then to Manoah his father, a native of Zorah in the tribe of Dan, with a ſtrict charge to the mother, that ſhe ſhould abſtain both from wine and ſtrong drink, and from all unclean meats, during her pregnancy; and that no razor ſhould come on the child's head all his life, becauſe he was to be a Nazarite from his birth. Samſon, for that was the name which his parents gave him (Q), began to give ſome early marks of extraordinary courage and ſtrength; and the text ſays, that the ſpirit of the Lord began to move him at times in the camp of the Danites, between Zorah and Eſhtaol [f], the place of his abode.

How he plagued the Philiſtines during his twenty years government, and was at length betrayed into their hands by a treacherous harlot, ſhorn and bereaved of his ſtrength and eyes, became the object of their ſcorn and revenge, and how, after near a year's miſerable ſervitude, he buried with himſelf all the Philiſtine nobles under the ruins of a magnificent ſtructure, we have ſeen in the hiſtory of that nation †. The text adds, that he deſtroyed a greater number of his enemies by his death, than he had done in his life-time; and that his friends and relations hearing of it, came and fetched

[f] Judg. xiii. 25. † See Vol. II. p. 208. & ſeq.

(Q) It is not eaſy to dive into the etymon of this name; that which comes neareſt to it is ſtill ſomewhat forced, being derived from שמש Shemeſh the Sun, and the feminine Syriac pronoun ן An, their, their Sun; which, as ſome pretend, prognoſticated the riſing of the Hebrews, and ſetting of the Philiſtines (54). Others derive it from the Chaldee שמש Shameſh in Pibel, which ſignifies to miniſter or ſerve, as the ſun doth to all the world. Joſephus ſays, that Samſon ſignifies robuſt (55); by which it is plain, he knew nothing of Hebrew, or its derivatives. However, we have obſerved more than once, that there is ſo little credit to be given to etymologies, eſpecially when they are ſo far fetched as this is, that it is not worth a further enquiry.

Our archbiſhop Uſher places Samſon's birth in the ſecond year of their thraldom, and gives this ſubſtantial reaſon for it, that he is ſaid to have avenged the Iſraelites twenty years (56), and that he can ſcarcely be ſuppoſed to have entered into this office before the 18th year of his age (57).

(54) Vid. vocabul. Hebr. & St. Philip. in vit. Samſon. (55) Ant. lib. 5. c. 10 (56) Judg xv. ver. ult. (57) Vid. Uſſer. ſub. A. M. 2849.

him

his body away, and buried it in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors [g] (R).

THOUGH this extraordinary ſlaughter of the Philiſtine nobility did not put an end to their ſlavery, yet it inſpired the Iſraelites with freſh courage, to attempt the regaining of their liberty; but their horrid wickedneſs proved an invincible obſtacle to their ſucceſs. Eli, their judge, was almoſt an hundred years old [h]; and his two ſons, Hophni and Phinehas, who acted under him, took the advantage of his extreme weakneſs, to commit the greateſt abominations. The ſcripture brands them with ſome of the vileſt characters; ſuch as, that they were ſons of Belial; that they knew not the Lord; that they committed ſuch infamous irregularities in the ſervice of the tabernacle, as cauſed the people to abhor the offering of the Lord; that they debauched the women that aſſembled at the door of the tabernacle, and that their crimes were very great [i]: by all which one may eaſily gueſs to what exceſs of wickedneſs a people ſo naturally prone to it, muſt have run under ſuch profligate governors. Eli was not ignorant of all this; and yet, inſtead of inflicting ſome exemplary puniſhment upon his ſons, or at leaſt of diſcarding them from their office, and beſtowing it upon perſons of more zeal and integrity, he contented himſelf with giving them a gentle reproof; ſo gentle indeed that he ſeems not to have had the courage to tell them, that their actions were vile and abo- Hophni and Phinehas.

[g] Judg. xvi. 30, 31. [h] 1 Sam. iv. 15. [i] Ibid. ii. 12, & ſeq.

(R) Joſephus places the hiſtory of Ruth after the death of Samſon (58), contrary to the greater part of the Jews (59), who think Boaz to have been the ſame with Ibzan the 10th judge of Iſrael, as we hinted above, becauſe he was of Bethlehem, and that there is ſome conformity in their names; but they are both palpably out of all chronology. Some of our chronologers place it in the time of Deborah (60); others under Gideon; but the moſt probable opinion is that, which places it in the time of Shamgar, the third judge, about 120 years after Joſhua (61).

As for the book itſelf, it is plain, it was not written before David's time, becauſe he is named in the genealogy of Boaz (62), though the ſtory appears to have happened in the time of ſome one of the judges, by the very firſt verſe of it.

(58) Ant. lib. 5. (59) Targ. in Ruth. Talm. Hieroſ. RR. Sal. Kimchi. Levi Ben David. Abr. Zaccut. & al. (60) Toſtat. Tremel. De Lyr. Genebr. & al. (61) Uſſer. (62) Ruth. c. ult. ver. ult.

animable,

minable, but only that they were not good [k]. No wonder then if such an expostulation made so little impression on those two profligate young men (S).

THIS remissness in a high-priest and a judge, was so displeasing to GOD, that he sent a prophet to upbraid him with his ingratitude, and to assure him, that the high-priesthood should be taken from his house; that his two sons should be cut off in one day; and that the survivors of his family should pine away with the utmost poverty and misery [l]. This heavy sentence was again confirmed by GOD to young Samuel in a vision, and by him related unto Eli.

Samuel was the child of age and barrenness, obtained by the prayers of his mother, dedicated to GOD by a solemn vow, and entered into his service at the age of three years [m]. As he grew up, he was appointed to minister to Eli in the holy functions, girded with a linen ephod, and to open and shut the doors of the tabernacle. One morning, before break of day, as he lay in his bed near unto Eli's chamber, he heard himself called, and ran to him, supposing it had been he that had called him. Eli bad him return to his bed this time, and the next; but upon his coming the third time, he began to think, that there was something extraordinary in that voice, and directed young Samuel what answer to make, if he should be called again, as he was accordingly soon after. It was then that GOD revealed to him the heavy judgments

[k] Ibid. ver. 24. [l] Ibid. ver. 27. ad fin. [m] 1 Sam. i, ii, & iii. pass.

(S) Were we to follow the sense of our own and some other versions, we should be apt to attribute their incorrigibleness to what is said in the 25th verse of the second chapter, that they hearkened not to the voice of their father, because the Lord would slay them. Would not any one be apt to conclude from thence, that it was with design to destroy them, that God thrust them headlong into this disobedience? We therefore beg leave here to remind our readers, that the conjunction כִּי Ki, which is rendered because, doth often signify, and ought, both here and in several other places (63), to have been translated wherefore, or though; so that the sense will be, they did not hearken to their father, wherefore it pleased the Lord to slay them; or, they hearkened not — though the Lord threatened to slay them for their disobedience (64).

(63) Int. al. Gen. viii. 21. Jerem. vii. 10. Ps. lxxviii. 19.
(64) Vid Buxtorf. Lexic. Hebr. Nold. Concord. part. Hebr. Amam. Grammat. Hebr. Alsted. Vorst, Le Scen. & al.

he

he had denounced againſt Eli's houſe. Samuel was fearful of diſcloſing the dreadful purport of the viſion, till ſtrictly charged and adjured to it by him, after which he became known, from the one end of the kingdom to the other, to be a prophet of the Lord, and to be eſtabliſhed judge in Iſrael in Eli's ſtead [n] (T).

[n] 1 Sam. iii. 1 ſeq.

(T) Samuel was of the tribe of Levi, of the branch of Kohath; but becauſe he exerciſed ſeveral prieſtly functions, ſuch as anointing of Saul and David, offering up ſacrifices even out of the tabernacle, his wearing a linen ephod, and being named by the Pſalmiſt with Moſes and Aaron, the prieſts of the Lord (65), ſome antient fathers have thought him to have been of the race of Aaron, and to have performed the function of high-prieſt after the death of Eli and his two ſons (66). Joſephus ſeems to hint ſomething like it, when he ſays, that Saul knew him to be Samuel, when he appeared to the witch of Endor in a prieſtly veſt (67), though he calls his father a plain Levite, where he ſpeaks of his birth (68); but it appears from the Chronicles, that he was of the branch of Kohath, the ſecond ſon of Levi (69), and as for his wearing of an ephod, David did the ſame (70); and Gideon, Manoah, Saul, Elijah, and others, who were neither prieſts nor Levites, have ſacrificed upon particular occaſions; and ſome prophets, and even their diſciples have anointed kings (71). As to the paſſage in the Pſalms, he is only mentioned there among them that call upon the Lord; by which may be meant, either the Levites in general, whoſe office it was; or elſe, as is more likely, from the next verſe, among them that called to God effectually, ſo as to be heard by him, as Moſes and Aaron did; but who did officiate in the high prieſt's function after Eli's death, is neither eaſy, nor of moment to gueſs, but more probably, one of the Aaronic race than a Levite.

One expreſſion, however, in the threatening meſſage of the prophet to Eli, would make one think that ſome perſon of the elder branch was choſen to the high-prieſthood, even in his life-time, either by reaſon of his inability, being grown almoſt blind with age, or for his remiſſneſs, or both. The words are, and thou ſhalt ſee an enemy in my habitation, in all the wealth which God ſhall give Iſrael (72); where it is to be obſerved, that the word צַר Tzar, which we render an enemy, doth ſignify a rival; and is uſed in that ſenſe, in the very beginning of this book (73). Now it is plain, that this rival could be no other than ſome head of the elder

(65) Pſ. xcix. 6. (66) Auguſt. in Pſ. xcviii. cont. Fauſt. & alib. Chryſoſt. Ambr. & al. vid. Mendez. in 1 Reg. ii. (67) Ant. lib. vi. c. 15. (68) Ibid. lib. v. c. 11. (69) 1 Chron. vi. 22, & ſeq. (70) 2 Sam. vi. 14. (71) Vid. int. al. 2 King. ix. 1, & ſeq. (72) 1 Sam. ii. 32. (73) Ibid. i. 6.

NOT long after this, the Israelites, being repulsed in an attempt against the Philistines, with the loss of four thousand men, took it into their heads to bring the ark of God into their camp, in hopes at least, that it would strike a terror into their enemies, and inspire the people with more than ordinary courage; but the consequence of this wild project was, that they lost both the battle and the ark †, and the two sons of Eli that bare it, their lives, all in one day. The old priest, who waited with impatience to hear of the success of the battle, had seated himself on a bench in the highway to Shiloh, being under the greatest concern for the ark of God; and as soon as he heard the news of its being taken by the enemy, he fainted away, and falling backward from his seat, broke his neck and died. His daughter-in-law likewise, Phinehas's wife, being then near her time, fell in travail upon receiving all this dreadful news, and testified the excess of her grief by calling the child she was delivered of I-chabod, to signify, that the glory of Israel was departed, and expired immediately after [o]. Phinehas left another son named Ahitub, who is supposed to have succeeded his grand-father Eli in the high-priest's office, because we find his son Ahiah in that dignity in Saul's time [p]; from whom it passed to Abimelech his brother, who was killed by that jealous prince [q], and from him to his son Abiathar, who was the last of Eli's race that enjoyed it. But as to the government, it was given by God to Samuel, a man of uncommon zeal and courage, and fit to reduce the Israelites from their abominable defection and idolatry. This was indeed what he applied himself to with good success, being feared and reverenced by all Israel, who knew him to be the chosen prophet of God, and that none of his words fell to the ground.

WHAT betided the ark of the covenant, and those that kept it captive, and its being sent back, we have already seen *. Its wonderful and unexpected return to Bethshemesh caused an universal joy in all the people, who came crowding from all the adjacent parts to feast their eyes with the sight of it, it being then the time of harvest. The field where it stopt had in it a large stone, upon which the priests and Levites elder branch of Eleazar, from whom the priest-hood had been transferred to him; but we will not affirm any thing further about it.

† See before, p. 56. [o] 1 Sam. iv. 12 to the end, [p] Ibid. xiv. 3. [q] Ibid. xxii. 16, & seq. * See Vol. II. p. 214, & seq.

offered up the two milch-kine that brought it for a burnt-offering. This was accompanied with ſeveral others, which the inhabitants of the place ſacrificed there; after which the ark and treſpaſs-offering were depoſited upon the ſame ſtone. But their joy was ſoon after unhappily turned into mourning, through the irreverence of the Bethſhemeſhites, whom an imprudent curioſity enticed to look into the ſacred ſymbol of the divine preſence, and for which fifty thouſand and ſeventy men were puniſhed with immediate death (V). This terrible ſlaughter ſtruck ſuch terror into them, that they ſent to the inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim, a city in the neighbourhood of Bethſhemeſh, and in the tribe of Judah, deſiring that they would fetch the ark away from them [r]; which they accord-

[r] 1 Sam. vi.

(V) This is what ours and moſt other verſions make the original to ſay, for which reaſon we have not dared to depart from it; though we own, with the learned Bochart, that we can neither conceive, how there could be ſuch a multitude of people in a village on the borders of Judæa; nor how it could be conſiſtent with the goodneſs of God, to make ſuch a ſlaughter of thoſe men, who came with joy to receive the ark, ſuppoſing ſuch a number could really have all looked into it.

But we beg leave to obſerve here, that the original is capable of a two-fold ſenſe, beſides this in our verſion, both which do greatly leſſen that number, and remove the difficulty. The firſt is that of Bochart above mentioned (74), who ſhews, that it ought to have been rendered fifty men of a thouſand, inſtead of fifty thouſand, that is in all ſeventy; becauſe, as he obſerves rightly after St. Jerom (75), it is not uſual in the Hebrew to make the thouſands go before the inferior numbers when they make up a total ſum, but they conſtantly begin with the leſſer number and end with the greater. Joſephus has taken it in the ſame ſenſe (76), and reckons but ſeventy ſlain.

The other ſenſe is, that there were ſlain ſeventy men, בעם, Baham, of the common people, and חמישים אלף איש, Chamiſhim eleph iſh, fifty of the heads or captains of the people; for the word אלף ſignifies alſo a leader or captain. This ſeems to have been the opinion of Junius, though he has retracted it ſince, or Tremellius for him, to adhere to the vulgar one, though without giving any reaſon for his ſo doing (77). In memory of the mourning which their death cauſed among the people, the ſtone, or rock, upon which the ark reſted, when they looked into it, was called אבן אבל Eben Abel, the ſtone of mourning.

(74) Phaleg ſub Bethſhemeſh. Vid. & Le Scen. Eſſay on a new verſ. part 2. ch. 6. § 4. (75) In Hebdom. Dan. (76) Ant. l. vi. c. 2. (77) Vid. Trem. in loc.

ingly did, and placed it in the houſe of one Abinadab, which ſtood on the higheſt part of the city, where it continued till David's time, that is about ſeventy years, and conſecrated his ſon Eleazar to be the keeper of it (W).

It may indeed be juſtly wondered, why the ark was not either ſent back to Shiloh, where the tabernacle and its ſacred utenſils ſtood, or that theſe at leaſt were not brought to Kirjath-jearim. But whatever be the reaſon of this irregularity, Samuel, who acted by this time both as prophet and judge, took occaſion from the people's aſſembling in great multitudes before the ark, to lament their not yet recovered liberty; to perſuade them to put away Aſhtaroth and their other ſtrange deities from among them, and to ſerve the Lord alone; upon which condition only, he could promiſe them a ſpeedy deliverance from the Philiſtine yoke. The people readily complied, and afterwards aſſembled themſelves at Mizpeh according to his appointment, where they faſted, and prayed, and expreſſed all the tokens of a lively repentance. This unuſual meeting gave an umbrage to the Philiſtines, who immediately took up arms, and came up againſt them; but Samuel, having offered up a ſucking lamb for a burnt-offering, did by his prayers obtain ſuch a ſtorm of thunder and lightning, as quite diſcomfited their enemies, whom the Iſraelites purſued with a great ſlaughter unto Beth-car. In memory of this ſignal victory, Samuel cauſed a great ſtone to be erected between Mizpeh and Shen, which he called Eben-ezer, or the ſtone of help; and from that time to Samuel's death, the Philiſtines were ſo far from making any further attempt againſt Iſrael, that they ſuffered them to recover all the cities and fortreſſes which had been taken from them, from Ekron even unto Gath, and the territories about them †. At the ſame time the Iſraelites were at peace with the Amorites, ſo that the land enjoyed a profound peace all the time of Samuel's government; whilſt he, to make it eaſier to the people, left Ramah, his uſual reſidence and the place of his nativity, once a year to take a circuit round Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpeh, to adminiſter judgment; and then returned to his own city, where he had built

† See Vol. II. p. 217.

(W) Some have fancied, that this Abinadab was of the race of Aaron, or at leaſt a Levite, though without any viſible grounds, or indeed any neceſſity; ſince he was to be but a bare keeper of the ark, and that perhaps no longer, than till ſome proper prieſts and Levites were ſent for from Shiloh to miniſter before it.

an

an altar unto God, and whither the people might reſort unto him at all other times [r] (X).

By that time Samuel had judged Iſrael twenty years, with great integrity and applauſe, he had the mortification to hear that his two ſons, Joel and Abiah, whom he had, in his latter days, made judges at Beerſheba (Y), did not follow their father's ſteps, but ſuffered themſelves to be bribed to pervert judgment; upon which account he ſaw himſelf ſurrounded by the elders of Iſrael, who deſired him that he would appoint to them a king, who might be a judge over them, and that they might be like other nations, ſince his ſons were not worthy to ſucceed him in his office. Such a propoſal could not but be highly diſpleaſing to him, who plainly foreſaw the danger of ſuch horrid ingratitude, and that, by caſting off the government of God over them, they would make themſelves unworthy of his protection. He expoſtulated with them, he upbraided them with their ingratitude, and forewarned them of their danger; and, among other diſſuaſives, he laid before them all the miſchiefs and grievances they were likely to ſuffer from a king, in the moſt lively terms. In a word, he omitted nothing that could poſſibly divert them from their deſign; but all to no purpoſe, till God commanded him to [r] 1 Sam. vii. to the end.

(X) It appears from thence, that Samuel left Shiloh ſoon after the death of Eli, and the taking of the ark, and that he never returned thither, at leaſt to dwell. It is indeed probable, that the ark being removed from thence, all kind of religious ceremonies had ceaſed there; for which reaſon it is ſaid, that he built an altar at Ramah, the place of his reſidence, that the people might reſort to him, either for judgment, or to offer ſacrifices to God. This thing however was far from being according to the Moſaic law; but it ſeemed a caſe of neceſſity, becauſe the ark being at one place, and the tabernacle in another, neither of them could be properly reſorted to for ſacrificing, or any other part of public worſhip.

(Y) This Samuel had probably done, either to try how they would behave themſelves in that important poſt, or perhaps for the convenience of thoſe who lived at too great a diſtance from Ramah; Beerſheba being at one extremity of Iſrael, as Dan was on the other. Joſephus adds, that he appointed the eldeſt to keep his reſidence at Bethel, and the other at Beerſheba, and ordered them to take a yearly circuit at proper places, ſo as that each ſhould have one half of Iſrael to his ſhare (78); but the text ſays nothing of it.

(78) Ant. l. vi. c. 3.

hearken to them, and to ſet ſuch a king over them as he ſhould direct. Whereupon Samuel, having promiſed to comply with their demand, diſmiſſed them for the preſent [t], and Saul was ſoon after appointed by God to be the firſt king of Iſrael.

SECT. VIII.

The Hiſtory of the JEWS, under their Monarchical Government.

Saul, firſt king of Iſrael.

Year of the Flood, 1904. Year before Chriſt 1095.

SAUL was the ſon of Kiſh, of the tribe of Benjamin; he was a very comely youth, well-ſhaped, and taller by the head and ſhoulders than the common ſize. He had been ſent with a ſervant, about the time of the Iſraelites defection, to ſeek after ſome ſtrayed aſſes; and after three days uſeleſs ſearch, his man adviſed him to go to Ramah, near unto which they were then come, and enquire of the prophet Samuel, what he ſhould do next. Samuel, who knew him to be the perſon appointed by God to the regal dignity, and was then going to bleſs a ſacrifice which was held in that city, took that opportunity to introduce him to the feaſt, where he ſet him in the higheſt place, and diſtinguiſhed him from all the other gueſts, by a particular diſh of meat ſet before him above the reſt. He detained him all that night, and on the morrow early he called him up to receive his directions, and accompanied him ſome part of the way; and having commanded his ſervant to go on before [u], he poured the oil upon his head, and ſaluted him king of Iſrael. Saul behaved, during all this ceremony, with extraordinary modeſty, alledging the ſmallneſs of his tribe and family, as an argument of his being unfit for ſo high a dignity; but the prophet aſſured him, that he ſhould find himſelf endued with ſuch a ſuperior portion of God's ſpirit, as would give him a new heart, and a new diſpoſition, ſo that he would ſhortly feel himſelf quite another man. He then gave him ſome further directions relating to the occaſion of his journey, and his return home, and taking his leave of him for that time, left him to overtake his ſervant. Among other things that Samuel told him ſhould befal him in his way home, one was, that he would be met by a company of prophets, and that he would then receive the ſpirit of prophecy, and propheſie with them. This, as well as the reſt, came to paſs accordingly, and the ſurpriſe with which thoſe of his acquaintance beheld it, occaſioned that ſaying, which paſſed afterwards into a proverb, Is Saul alſo among the prophets[x]! Soon after this Samuel called all the heads of Iſrael to Mizpeh, and cauſed them to preſent themſelves by their tribes before the Lord; and as they paſſed in their order, that of Benjamin was taken; then were the families of it called, and that of Matri was taken; and next to that the ſon of Kiſh[y].

[t] Ibid. ch. viii. 1, & ſeq. [u] Ch. ix.

which

WHILST this was doing, Saul who knew where the lot would fall, had hid himſelf ſo well among ſome houſhold lumber, that they could not find him, till they were directed to him by the Lord; and as ſoon as he was brought out, Samuel preſented him to the people, as the perſon whom God had choſen to be their head, and immediately the air rang with the peoples ſhouts, Long live the king. Here Samuel, who at their firſt tumultuous meeting, had forewarned them of all that a king might do in the plenitude of his power, and what they had to fear from him, did now think it neceſſary to inform him, before the aſſembly, of what he ought to do, and what to avoid. He therefore read to them the laws which had been preſcribed before by God himſelf to Moſes: laws which were equally levelled againſt tyranny and anarchy; and to which he perhaps added ſome others, as he was a prophet; becauſe it is added, that he cauſed them to be written, and depoſited by the ark[z], where thoſe we read in Deuteronomy concerning the duty of a king, had been before laid up by Moſes. Saul being thus proclaimed and anointed king of Iſrael, Samuel diſmiſſed the aſſembly, and the new king returned to his houſe in Gibeah, whither a number of brave honeſt men of Iſrael followed him; whilſt another company of looſe fellows, who deſpiſed his youth and comelineſs, and thought him unfit for ſuch a government, refuſed to acknowledge him, or to bring him any preſents, as the reſt did.

BUT it was not long before he had an occaſion to give them an earneſt of his courage, and to let them ſee how well he could uſe his new authority. The inhabitants of Jabeſh-gilead were ſtreightly beſieged by the Ammonites, and upon the brink of loſing not only their liberty, but their right eye, as a laſting reproach to the whole nation; when having obtained a reſpite of ſeven days from the Ammoniti/h king, they ſent an account of their diſmal ſtate to the elders of Iſrael. Saul was then in the fields with his cattle, when theſe

[x] Ch x. 11. [y] Ver. 21. [z] Ver. 25.

heavy

heavy tidings came, and at his return, found the people all in tears, and being informed of the occaſion of it, he immediately took a yoke of oxen, and cauſed them to be hewed in pieces, and diſpatched with the utmoſt ſpeed through all the tribes, with this threatening meſſage, that whoſoever refuſed to follow him to the relief of their brethren of Jabeſh-gilead, his cattle ſhould undergo the ſame fate. The people, alarmed with this news, did immediately repair to Bezek, to the number of three hundred thouſand, beſides thirty thouſand of the tribe of Judah; and Saul having ſent the beſieged word that he would come to their reſcue by the next morning, marched all that night; and as ſoon as he came near the enemy, he divided his army into three bodies, and fell upon them by break of day with ſuch fury, that they were forced to raiſe the ſiege, and to fly with the utmoſt precipitation, and a very conſiderable loſs *. The people, elevated with this ſignal victory, were for putting to death all that had refuſed to acknowledge Saul for their king; but he generouſly withſtood it, alledging that it was not fit to ſtain the beginning of his reign with the ſlaughter of their brethren, after God had wrought ſo great a ſalvation in Iſrael. This moderate anſwer pleaſed the people ſtill more, and Samuel, who had accompanied him to the battle, invited now the people to Gilgal, there to confirm the kingdom unto Saul by an univerſal conſent, ſince he had ſhewed himſelf ſo worthy of it. This was accordingly done, and the ceremony was accompanied with joy, and acclamations, and with peace-offerings, which were there offered unto the Lord [a].

BEFORE Samuel diſmiſſed this numerous aſſembly, he took that opportunity to juſtify his conduct, during the whole time of his adminiſtration, as judge. This was indeed a proper time, becauſe his authority being devolved upon Saul, who was then preſent, could be no longer a check to any of them from exhibiting their complaint, if any ſuch they had againſt him. He therefore challenged them, as he was now old, and ready to leave the world, to accuſe him openly before their new king, if he had committed any fraud, injuſtice, or oppreſſion againſt any of them, that he might now make them reſtitution before he died; and he had the ſatisfaction of being anſwered by the general voice, that he had neither wronged nor oppreſſed them in any caſe. He was not content with this ample teſtimony, but made them take God to witneſs that they ſpoke from their heart, which they readily did. Samuel ſeems to have had a double deſign in this expoſtulation, beſides that of clearing his own character; the firſt was, to ſhew young Saul a pattern to copy after, and the other, to make the people ſenſible of their ingratitude to God, in deſiring to be governed in a different way than he had hitherto appointed, and that unleſs they proved more obedient for the future, their new form of government would be of little benefit to them; ſince neither that, nor any other, could preſerve them from their enemies, without the divine bleſſing, which if they forfeited by their obſtinate wickedneſs, would bring infallible ruin upon their king and themſelves. To convince them of this, he recapitulated to them all the grievous thraldoms which their idolatry and diſobedience had drawn upon them, ſince their being ſeated in that land; and the many ſignal deliverances which God had wrought for them upon their repentance, without the help of a king; and to add a ſtill greater weight to his words, and to aſſure them that they did not proceed from any reſentment for their having been ſo preſſing for a king, even in his life-time, but becauſe God was highly diſpleaſed at it; he reminded them, that it was then the time of harveſt, when the air is generally ſerene, and free from clouds and ſtormy rains (Z); but he told them, that he would by his prayers obtain ſuch an extraordinary ſtorm of thunder and rain, as ſhould convince them, that God had been highly provoked by their ungrateful demand. He did ſo accordingly, and the people were frighted into a confeſſion of their wickedneſs, and of this particular aggravation of it, their aſking him for a king. They deſired him, that he would uſe his prayers to avert the impending ſtorm and danger; which he readily complyed with, and then aſſured them, that he would continue his good offices to them as long as he lived; and that if they and their

* See Vol. II. p. 103. [a] Ch. xi.

they

(Z) This Samuel juſtly calls the great thing which the Lord would do before their eyes (79); and the people could not but eſteem it ſuch, becauſe that country was obſerved to be entirely free from ſuch ſtormy weather all the time of harveſt, and to have the former and latter rain before and after it; but whether this was really miraculous, or whether the prophet, by ſome way or other, foreſaw it gathering, it anſwered his purpoſe, and wrought the deſired effect upon that incredulous and head-ſtrong people; and prevented them applauding their choice of a kingly government, or attributing their late or any future victory to that extraordinary piece of politics.

(79) 1 Sam. xii. 16.

king

heavy tidings came, and at his return, found the people all in tears, and being informed of the occaſion of it, he immediately took a yoke of oxen, and cauſed them to be hewed in pieces, and diſpatched with the utmoſt ſpeed through all the tribes, with this threatening meſſage, that whoſoever refuſed to follow him to the relief of their brethren of Jabeſh-gilead, his cattle ſhould undergo the ſame fate. The people, alarmed with this news, did immediately repair to Bezek, to the number of three hundred thouſand, beſides thirty thouſand of the tribe of Judah; and Saul having ſent the beſieged word that he would come to their reſcue by the next morning, marched all that night; and as ſoon as he came near the enemy, he divided his army into three bodies, and fell upon them by break of day with ſuch fury, that they were forced to raiſe the ſiege, and to fly with the utmoſt precipitation, and a very conſiderable loſs *. The people, elevated with this ſignal victory, were for putting to death all that had refuſed to acknowledge Saul for their king; but he generouſly withſtood it, alledging that it was not fit to ſtain the beginning of his reign with the ſlaughter of their brethren, after God had wrought ſo great a ſalvation in Iſrael. This moderate anſwer pleaſed the people ſtill more, and Samuel, who had accompanied him to the battle, invited now the people to Gilgal, there to confirm the kingdom unto Saul by an univerſal conſent, ſince he had ſhewed himſelf ſo worthy of it. This was accordingly done, and the ceremony was accompanied with joy, and acclamations, and with peace-offerings, which were there offered unto the Lord [a].

BEFORE Samuel diſmiſſed this numerous aſſembly, he took that opportunity to juſtify his conduct, during the whole time of his adminiſtration, as judge. This was indeed a proper time, becauſe his authority being devolved upon Saul, who was then preſent, could be no longer a check to any of them from exhibiting their complaint, if any ſuch they had againſt him. He therefore challenged them, as he was now old, and ready to leave the world, to accuſe him openly before their new king, if he had committed any fraud, injuſtice, or oppreſſion againſt any of them, that he might now make them reſtitution before he died; and he had the ſatisfaction of being anſwered by the general voice, that he had neither wronged nor oppreſſed them in any caſe. He was not content with this ample teſtimony, but made them take God to witneſs that they ſpoke from their heart, which they readily did. Samuel ſeems to have had a double deſign in this expoſtulation, beſides that of clearing his own character; the firſt was, to ſhew young Saul a pattern to copy after, and the other, to make the people ſenſible of their ingratitude to God, in deſiring to be governed in a different way than he had hitherto appointed, and that unleſs they proved more obedient for the future, their new form of government would be of little benefit to them; ſince neither that, nor any other, could preſerve them from their enemies, without the divine bleſſing, which if they forfeited by their obſtinate wickedneſs, would bring infallible ruin upon their king and themſelves. To convince them of this, he recapitulated to them all the grievous thraldoms which their idolatry and diſobedience had drawn upon them, ſince their being ſeated in that land; and the many ſignal deliverances which God had wrought for them upon their repentance, without the help of a king; and to add a ſtill greater weight to his words, and to aſſure them that they did not proceed from any reſentment for their having been ſo preſſing for a king, even in his life-time, but becauſe God was highly diſpleaſed at it; he reminded them, that it was then the time of harveſt, when the air is generally ſerene, and free from clouds and ſtormy rains (Z); but he told them, that he would by his prayers obtain ſuch an extraordinary ſtorm of thunder and rain, as ſhould convince them, that God had been highly provoked by their ungrateful demand. He did ſo accordingly, and the people were frighted into a confeſſion of their wickedneſs, and of this particular aggravation of it, their aſking him for a king. They deſired him, that he would uſe his prayers to avert the impending ſtorm and danger; which he readily complyed with, and then aſſured them, that he would continue his good offices to them as long as he lived; and that if they and their

* See Vol. II. p. 103. [a] Ch. xi.

they

(Z) This Samuel juſtly calls the great thing which the Lord would do before their eyes (79); and the people could not but eſteem it ſuch, becauſe that country was obſerved to be entirely free from ſuch ſtormy weather all the time of harveſt, and to have the former and latter rain before and after it; but whether this was really miraculous, or whether the prophet, by ſome way or other, foreſaw it gathering, it anſwered his purpoſe, and wrought the deſired effect upon that incredulous and head-ſtrong people; and prevented them applauding their choice of a kingly government, or attributing their late or any future victory to that extraordinary piece of politics.

(79) 1 Sam. xii. 16.

king

king did but continue ſtedfaſt in their obedience to God, inſtead of confiding in their vain and deceitful idols, every thing would go well with them; but that if they relapſed, both he and they muſt expect to feel the effects of the divine diſpleaſure [b].

ALL theſe things were tranſacted in the firſt year of Saul's reign; on the next he diſmiſſed his numerous army, thinking perhaps, that his late victory had ſufficiently ſecured him from any attempt againſt Iſrael; and reſerved to himſelf only three thouſand men, two thouſand of whom he put into the gariſons of Michmaſh and Bethel, and the other thouſand he left at Gibeah of Benjamin, under his ſon Jonathan. But this young prince willing perhaps to atchieve ſomething worthy the ſon and ſucceſſor of Saul, went and ſmote a Philiſtine gariſon at Geba; the news of which having alarmed that nation, obliged his father to blow the trumpet, and to let Iſrael know, that the Philiſtines were coming againſt them with a numerous hoſt. They had indeed 30000 chariots and 6000 horſemen, beſides an innumerable multitude of foot with which they came and encamped againſt Michmaſh, eaſtward of Beth-aven (A). The ſight of ſo vaſt an army injected an univerſal terror in Iſrael, inſomuch that forgetting their late victory, and the valour which their new-made king had ſhewn upon that occaſion, a great part of that daſtardly people hid themſelves in caves, dens, pits, or any lurking holes; whilſt another part fled to the other ſide Jordan for ſafety, leaving their country open to their enemies frequent and deſtructive incurſions, and their king to make the beſt of the puſillanimous remains of the people that ſtuck cloſe unto him. One misfortune however attended them, which may in ſome meaſure excuſe their defection, which was, that the Philiſtines had taken care to ſtrip them of all kinds of weapons, and even of the inſtruments with which they uſed to ſharpen their rural tools, leſt they ſhould uſe them inſtead of arms. They had neither ſmith nor forge, and ſo naked were they at this time, that there was neither ſword nor ſpear, but thoſe which Saul and his ſon had c, when he came to muſter his little army (B). Saul however continued with them at Gilgal, expecting Samuel's coming according to his appointment; but after he had waited ſeven whole days, and found that Samuel neither came nor ſent, and that his little army was almoſt dwindled away to a ſmall handful, reſolved nevertheleſs to make a brave reſiſtance, in caſe he ſhould be attacked by the enemy; and afraid leſt he ſhould be ſurpriſed by them, before he had implored the protection of God in the uſual way of ſacrifices, he ventured, on the ſeventh day, to offer up ſome peace-offerings and a burnt-offering. He had ſcarce made an end of ſacrificing, when Samuel came, and blamed him highly for what he had done (C). Saul excuſed himſelf upon the preſſing neceſſity he was in; c Ch. xiii. 19, & ſeq.

[b] 1 Sam. xii.

(A) Concerning this prodigious number of chariots, we have already given our opinion in the hiſtory of that people, to which we refer the reader, where he will alſo ſee an account of the whole ſucceſs of this war, with the reflection of a late learned critic upon it †.

† See Vol. II. p. 217. note (I).

(B) The reſt of this ſmall body were armed, as one may reaſonably ſuppoſe, with ſuch weapons as they could make without the ſmith's help, ſuch as ſlings, flails, clubs, ſtaves, wooden prongs, ſtaves hardened in the fire, and other rural tools: the firſt of theſe, the ſlings, in which they were very expert, they might all uſe at the firſt onſet, and the others when they came to cloſer engagement.

(C) It is not eaſy to divine what Saul's crime was, which drew upon him ſuch a ſevere ſentence from the prophet. The Jews indeed accuſe him, 1. Of not having waited the full time for him, and 2. Of having preſumed to infringe upon the prieſtly office, by offering up ſacrifices to God with his unhallowed hands (80). Joſephus ſeems to ſay much the ſame thing, though not in plain terms; but he adds, that Saul had ſent for Samuel to adviſe with him, who ſent him word back, that he ſhould continue where he was, and get ſacrifices in readineſs againſt he came to him; which would be at the end of ſeven days, when he would come and offer them up unto God.—Saul, adds he, waited out his time, but moſt unhappily failed in another article of his commiſſion, for the prophet he found delayed his coming, and his men perpetually deſerting him, ſo that he offered up the ſacrifice without waiting any longer for Samuel (81). As for the firſt of theſe, his not waiting the whole time, it appears of too ſmall a nature, conſidering the ſtreight he was in through the conſtant deſertion of his army, to have deſerved a total rejection; and as to the laſt, it is ſcarcely probable, becauſe he had the high-prieſt Abiab with him to perform that office for him, or to have hindered him from doing it, if he had gone a-in; but whether the prophet took it as a preſage of his future diſobedience and want of faith, and deſigned only to intimidate and forewarn him, or whether his rejection had been already revealed to him, he told him, that he had done a very fooliſh action, and that his diſobedience to God's command, would cauſe the kingdom to be transferred from him to a more worthy and faithful perſon. As ſoon as Samuel was departed from him to go to Gibeon, or the valley of Benjamin, Saul and his ſon followed him thither with his little army, conſiſting only of ſix hundred unarmed men. There they beheld with ſorrow the Philiſtines, who were ſtill incamped in Michmaſh, making a three-fold incurſion in Iſrael, and committing great depredations; one detachbout it. Some authors think (82) therefore, that there is a tranſpoſition of chapters, and that the crime for which he was rejected, was his not deſtroying the king of Amalek and all the plunder, according to God's command, the ſtory of which we have in the next chapter, wherein Samuel reproves him in the moſt ſevere terms for his diſobedience, and tells him plainly, that the Lord had rejected him from being king (83); but it is more likely, that in the former of theſe places, the prophet only threatens him with what he muſt expect, unleſs he took more heed of what God commanded him. For it is plain, that Saul was ſo far from being abſolutely rejected, that he not only was bleſſed with a great and almoſt miraculous victory, immediately after Samuel had left him, but that he was likewiſe very ſucceſsful againſt ſeveral other nations, and above all, received that freſh command from the ſame prophet, to fight and deſtroy the Amalekites with a promiſe of victory. As for what is ſaid, that the Lord hath ſought him a man after his own heart, and——ſhall command him to be head over his people (84); thoſe who are acquainted with the genius of the original know, that it may as well be taken in the future tenſe, the Lord ſhall ſeek, and ſo on; however, as to the words of the prophet, the Lord would have eſtabliſhed thy kingdom upon Iſrael for ever; it is plain, they cannot be underſtood in a literal ſenſe, becauſe the ſceptre was promiſed to the tribe of Judah, and to no other (85); and accordingly was ſoon after given to David, who was of that tribe.

(80) Vid. Munſt. in loc. (81) Ant. l. vi. c. 7.

Upon the whole therefore we think, that Saul was only threatened here by the prophet, for having acted foolihly, but in the chapter following, he is abſolutely rejected for his diſobedience, in ſparing Agag and the beſt of the plunder, contrary to God's expreſs command; for which reaſon Samuel charges him not with bare folly, but with downright rebellion, which he there compares to idolatry and witchcraft (86).

(82) Vid. Tremel. in loc. (83) 1 Sam. xv. 16, & ſeq. (84) Ibid. Ch. xiii. 14. (85) Gen. xlix. 10. (86) 1 Sam. xv. 23.

ment

ment towards Ophrah, another towards Beth-horon, and the third towards the valley of Zeboim [d].

THEY were in this dimal ſituation, when Jonathan, moved by ſome divine impulſe, ventured, unknown to his father or to any one but his armour-bearer, who accompanied him, to climb up on his hands and feet through a couple of cragged rocks, and to fall upon one of the enemy's out-guards, where he killed twenty of their men, and put the reſt to flight, who ran into the camp and ſpread ſuch a panic terror through the hoſt, that it was eaſily perceived by Saul and his men; who, finding that Jonathan was miſſing, eaſily gueſſed him to be the author of it. Saul had with him the ark of God, and Ahiah the high-prieſt, the great grandſon of Eli, and was going to deſire him to enquire of the Lord whether he ſhould fall on the enemy, when the noiſe and confuſion increaſed ſo far, as to aſſure him, that they were put to the rout. He bid then Ahiah to hold his hand, and with his few men fell on the flying Philiſtines, his army ſtill increaſing, as well from a number of Hebrew captives, who took that opportunity to turn tail to their oppreſſors, as from a greater number of thoſe, who, obſerving from their lurking holes the ſucceſs of their brethren, came and joined themſelves to their king.

THIS victory, great as it was *, might have been more complete, had not Saul unadviſedly adjured his army not to ſtop their purſuit to take ſome convenient refreſhment. This raſh curſe was like to have had ſeveral fatal conſequences; for beſides, that it hindered his weary ſoldiers from making ſo great a ſlaughter of the enemy as they might have done, and put too ſpeedy an end to their purſuit, by that time it came to be evening, they were ſo famiſhed, that they fell greedily upon the ſpoil, and would have eaten ſome of the cattle with the blood, had not the king timely prevented it. But what was like to have proved worſe than all the reſt was, that Jonathan, knowing nothing of his father's imprecation, and being quite ſpent with that day's toil, had refreſhed himſelf with a little honey which he met with in his way, ſo that when his tranſgreſſion came to be found out by Urim, Saul would infallibly have condemned him to die, had not the whole army oppoſed it with one conſent, and ſworn that not a hair of his head ſhould be hurt, in conſideration of the ſignal deliverance which he had been the chief cauſe of. After this Saul returned home, and put himſelf in a condition of purſuing his conqueſt, not only againſt the Phi- liſtines, but alſo againſt the Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, and the kings of Zobah and Amalek. His head general was Abner, the ſon of his uncle Ner; he had alſo two ſons beſides the brave Jonathan, and next to that of his army his care was to have a guard about him, made up of the valianteſt and ſtouteſt men he could find in his dominions [e].

[d] Ibid. * See Vol. II. p. 218.

THE ſacred hiſtory gives us no particular account of any of theſe wars, that againſt Amalek excepted, of which we have ſpoken in its proper place †; neither is it eaſy to gueſs at what periods of Saul's reign any of them happened. All that we can know is, that he reigned forty years [f]; that he was a valiant and ſucceſsful prince, continually at war with ſome neighbouring ſtate or other; and that he very much curbed the ſtrength of all his enemies round about. So that had he not been unmindful of God's command with reſpect to the king of Amalek and the plunder of his ſubjects, he might, in all likelihood, have reigned all his life without a rival [g]. But here he acted very unlike himſelf, not only in diſregarding the divine anathema which had been pronounced againſt that nation ever ſince their coming out of Egypt [h], and the prophet's charge in purſuance of it [i], but likewiſe in that poor pretence he made to Samuel, that he had fulfilled his command, when every thing about him ſhewed him, that he had acted quite contrary to it [k]; and next to this, in meanly excuſing his fault, by throwing one part of it upon the people's zeal to ſacrifice the beſt of the cattle to the Lord [l], and part upon his own fear of reſtraining them from it [m]. No wonder then if Samuel could not, without ſome indignation, hear a king of Iſrael betray ſo much meanneſs of ſoul to palliate an unjuſtifiable action; nor at the ſeverity with which he reproves him for it, when he was authoriſed by God to denounce unto him the loſs of his kingdom.

THIS ſentence, in which his crime was painted in the deepeſt colours, made a deep impreſſion upon Saul: he owned the charge, and begged of him, for decency ſake, and to prevent a defection of the people, that he would ſtill ſhew ſome regard to him, and accompany him, whilſt he went and paid his adoration to God; which the prophet complied with; and afterwards having cauſed the proud Amalekitiſh [e] 1 Sam xiv. paſſ. † See Vol. II. p. 154. [f] Acts xiii. 21. [g] See what has been ſaid in the laſt note. [h] Exod. xvii. 14. [i] 1 Sam. xv. 1, & ſeq. [k] Ibid. ver. 13, 14. & 20. [l] Ver. 15. [m] Ver. 24, 30, & ſeq. to the end.

king

king to be put to death (D), whoſe deſtroying ſword had bereaved ſo many mothers of their children, he returned to Ramah, the place of his abode; and from that time he never came more to Saul, but continued mourning for him [n], till he was reproved for it by God, and commanded to go to Bethlehem, and anoint one of the ſons of Jeſſe in his room.

Samuel was forced to colour his journey with the pretence of offering up a ſacrifice there; and accordingly took a young heifer with him, both to avoid giving any ſuſpicion to the jealous king, and to diſperſe the fears of the elders of Bethlehem at his unexpected arrival. As ſoon as he came to Jeſſe's houſe, he ordered all his ſons to paſs before him in order, and when he beheld the eldeſt of them, whom the hiſtory ſhews to have been a man of valour, he preſently ſuppoſed him to be the perſon choſen to be Saul's ſucceſſor; but God did ſoon let him ſee, that he judged quite otherwiſe, by rejecting him, as he did alſo the other ſix in their turns. Samuel, being ſurpriſed at it, aſked their father, whether theſe were all the ſons he had? who anſwered, that he had one more, a ſtripling, who was then keeping his ſheep, and was the youngeſt of all. He was bid to ſend for him; and as ſoon as David came in, Samuel was ordered to anoint him in the preſence of his brethren; and from that minute the ſpirit of the Lord came upon him (E). Samuel then made a feaſt to [n] Ch. xv. 34, 35.

(D) The text ſays, that Samuel himſelf put him to death (87); but the Hebrew idiom imports no more than his commanding it to be done. And indeed, beſides that Samuel is not recorded to have been a ſwords-man, he was then too old to perform ſuch an execution. An antient author (88) tells us that Agag having been reprieved, at his deſire, till the next morning, his wife, who came to ſee him that night, conceived by him that very Amalekite who did afterwards kill Saul, as a juſt puniſhment for his ſparing that monarch's life; but it is plain, that Saul was not ſo much as wounded, till he fell upon his own ſword and killed himſelf, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place; and that the young Amalekite, who brought the news of his death to David, did only pretend that he had killed him, in hopes to ingratiate himſelf to him, though it fell out otherwiſe.

(E) It is hardly to be ſuppoſed, that Samuel did then explain the whole myſtery of his anointing of David, which might have had ſome fatal conſequence, had it come to Saul's ears: but as it was

(87) Ibid. ver. 33. (88) Phil. Bibl. vid. St. Phil. Monarch. Hebr. in vit. Saul.

to Jesse's family, and to the elders of the city, and returned to Ramah, and David to his flocks.

NOT long after this, the spirit of the Lord having forsaken Saul, he began to feel himself tormented by an evil one, or by a deep melancholy; to dispel which, he was advised to get young David to play on the harp before him, who by this time had gained the reputation, not only of an expert musician, but of a sober, discreet, and valiant youth. He was sent for accordingly, and the ruddiness of his complexion, and comeliness of his person, joined with the sweetness of his music, won Saul's heart so far, that he made him his armour-bearer, and obtained of his father that he might still continue near his person. Whenever therefore Saul's distemper came upon him, David was ordered to divert him with his music, which never failed to give him ease; after which he returned home and went about his usual occupation. At least it appears by the sequel [o], that he stayed at Bethlehem during Saul's lucid intervals, one of which seems to have been so long, that when he came back to court, neither Saul, nor Abner his general, could tell who he was, as we read in the very next chapter [p] (F).

SAUL

[o] Ib. xvii. 15. [p] Ib. ver. 55. to the end.

was usual to anoint men to the office of prophet, as well as to the regal dignity, it is more likely, that he left them to suppose the former; which they might naturally enough do, both because David was but a stripling, not much above fifteen years of age, and too smug and tender to be taken for a promising warriour; and because the spirit of the Lord is said to have come upon him, as it used to do upon the prophets, after they were anointed. Josephus says, that Samuel only whispered the secret into David's and his father's ear, and concealed it from the rest. And indeed had his brethren known, or even suspected, that he had been anointed to the regal dignity, though we dare not say how far their envy might have induced some of them to have betrayed the secret to Saul, it is scarce credible, they would have used him with such roughness and ill manners as they did, when their father sent him to them to Saul's camp (89).

(F) This circumstance has given interpreters some difficulty to reconcile; some have thought this interval to have been so long, that David was quite altered, his beard grown, features and shape become more manly, so that he might not be easily known again (90). Some think that Saul not having seen him, but when he was

(89) 1 Sam. xvii. 28. (90) Tornel. Cajet. &c. al.

SAUL and his army were then encamped by the valley of Elah, in order to make head againſt the Philiſtines, who had by this time recovered themſelves from their defeat, and had perhaps alſo taken freſh courage at the news of Saul's diſtemper. They had pitched their camp at Ephes-dammim over-againſt them, which place was between Shochoh and Azekah in the tribe of Judah. A valley parted the two armies, which had contented themſelves with looking upon one another, without ſtriking a blow, during the ſpace of forty days, ſaving the daily challenges of the vapouring Goliath. But that which had chilled the hearts of all the Iſraelites did work a contrary effect upon young David, who was juſt was in his melancholy moods, and as it were out of his ſenſes, could retain no idea of him (91). but this is by no means probable, becauſe Saul is ſaid to have loved him exceedingly, when he was recovered from his paroxyſms. Some others, and among them Junius, think, that there is alſo a tranſpoſition of chapters, and that David had killed Goliath ſome time before he was ſent for to play before Saul, becauſe he is recommended to him as a man of valour, as well as a muſician (92). But we can by no means come into that notion upon ſuch ſlight grounds. David might have acquired the character of a valiant youth upon ſome other account, particularly, for reſcuing ſome of his flock out of the jaws of wild beaſts (93). And as to his being forgot at court, it may be eaſily accounted for, if to the growth of his ſhape, beard, &c. mentioned under the firſt head, we add, that when he played before Saul, he appeared in a dreſs ſuitable, and that he was now in his plain ſhepherd's habit, and juſt come from a journey; ſo that the king and his court, who had ſeen ſuch variety of faces ſince his departure, might not eaſily call him to mind.

As for the wonderful effects which his muſic had upon Saul, we need not have recourſe to miracles to account for it, as ſome commentators have done (94), who think, that he joined ſome pſalms or prayers with the melody of his harp, which were a kind of exorciſm againſt the evil ſpirit that troubled him. Every one may be ſenſible of the power of good muſic upon a melancholy perſon; which we take to be Saul's caſe. And as for it's being called an evil ſpirit ſent from the Lord, we take it to mean no more, than that God ſuffered him to fall into that diſmal diſtemper, as a puniſhment for his diſobedience. And this is ſo far from being our particular opinion, that it is at preſent the moſt received, and, as we think, the moſt agreeable to the genius of the original (95).

(91) Theodoret. Procop. in loc. (92) Vid. Jun. & Tremel. in loc. (93) 1 Sam. xvii. 34, & ſeq. (94) De Lyr. Toſtat. Ferrar. Cornel. a Lapid. & al. (95) Vid. Grot. Cajetan. Genebr. Le Clerc & al. mult.

arrived

arrived in the camp, being ſent thither by old Jeſſe with proviſions for his three elder brothers, who were then in Saul's army. As ſoon as he heard the news of this gigantic champion's having defied the army of the God of Iſrael, he drew a ſure omen from it, that God would deliver him into his hands; and though Saul's promiſing his daughter, as a reward to the man that ſhould ſlay him, had not been able to induce one Iſraelite to engage him, during that whole time, yet was not this young ſhepherd at all diſcouraged from offering himſelf to the combat. At his firſt preſenting himſelf to the king, all that beheld him did indeed judge him altogether unequal to ſuch an exploit; but he gave them ſuch proofs both of his valour and conduct, but eſpecially of his faith in God, that Saul ordered him to be armed cap-a-pee with his own armour. But David was ſoon forced to put it off, not being able to ſtir himſelf under the weight of it; and, with no other weapon than his ſling and a few pebble ſtones in his ſhepherd's pouch, ſallied forth againſt this mighty enemy; and in a few minutes after, brought his head and ſword, and laid it at the feet of Saul, who had by that time ſo far forgot him, that he was forced to inform him afreſh, that he was David the youngeſt ſon of Jeſſe [q].

WHAT effect this victory had over the amazed Philiſtines, we need not repeat here †. But David's behaviour wrought ſo much on the generous Jonathan, Saul's eldeſt ſon, that it gave birth to the moſt intimate friendſhip between them, inſomuch that the text ſays, their ſouls were knit together [r]; and David elſewhere tells us that it exceeded by far the love of women [s]. But it ſoon after made a much different impreſſion upon Saul, though at firſt he ſeemed charmed with his conduct, and gave him a conſiderable poſt in his army. What inſpired that prince with the firſt ſentiments of jealouſy againſt him, was the indiſcretion of a company of women, who came to meet them at their return from the battle, with vocal and inſtrumental muſic, and in their ſongs compared David to him, and ſaid, that Saul had killed his thouſands, and David his ten thouſands; which made him complain, that they would give him the kingdom next. From that time he looked upon him as a dangerous enemy, and himſelf unſafe till he had cut him off. His diſeaſe encreaſed his fear of him, or rather ſeemed to be wholly turned into jealouſy, of which David became the ſole object, and often narrowly eſcaped becoming the victim of it: for even on the very day [q] 1 Sam. xvii. † See Vol. II. p. 221. [r] 1 Sam. xviii. 1. [s] 2 Sam. i. 26.

after

after this noble exploit, whilſt David was endeavouring to eaſe his preſent fit, he threw a javelin at him with ſuch force, that it ſtuck againſt the wall. He attempted the ſame a ſecond time, but David eſcaped them both.

AT length, Saul obſerving how well David behaved, and was beloved by all the people, though he dreaded him the more for it, he ſaw himſelf under a neceſſity of acting more cloſely againſt him, by raiſing him to a higher poſt, and expoſing him to freſh dangers, in hopes to ſee him fall by the hand of the enemy. He promiſed him, at the ſame time, his eldeſt daughter, as a reward of his next victory; but David had the mortification to ſee her given to another preſently after. The next trap Saul laid for him was, to get ſome of his ſervants to tell him, that the king, who deſigned in earneſt to give him his ſecond daughter, would accept of a 100 Philiſtines foreſkins inſtead of a dowry. But here David came off again victorious, and brought him double that number; ſo that Saul, having no pretence left to excuſe himſelf from his promiſe, gave him Michal in marriage, whoſe ſincere affection, joined to that of her brother Jonathan, proved afterwards very ſerviceable to him, by defeating their father's bloody attempts againſt his life, even at the hazard of their own. David had again gained a ſignal victory over the Philiſtines, and was ſcarce returned to court, before he was in danger of being ſtuck to the wall with another javelin. This made him retire to his own houſe, whither Saul purſued him, cauſing the houſe to be beſet by ſome of his ſervants, where he would have been infallibly murdered by the next morning, had not his faithful wife contrived his eſcape, by conveying him privily out at a window in the dead of night, reſolved to give her huſband time to go far enough before he was purſued, and at any rate to bear the brunt of her father's reſentment, rather than be wanting in conjugal affection. When therefore the men came on the next morning to kill him, ſhe ſent them away, and told them, that he was very ill, and confined to his bed; ſhewing them at the ſame time the figure of a man, which ſhe had conveyed into it, and covered up with bed-cloths to prevent diſcovery (G). As ſoon as Saul heard of his being ſick, he ſent back the men,

(G) Joſephus gives a more refined account of this ſtratagem, and carefully avoids the teraphim mentioned in the text: but we have already confuted that ſubtle evaſion in another place (96), and we need no freſh proofs here of the author's partiality to his nation.

(96) See Vol. II. p. 401. not. (B).

with orders to bring him alive in his bed, that he might have the pleasure of stabbing him with his own hand; and it was then that Michal's stratagem being discovered, so exasperated her angry father, that she was forced to make him believe, that it was to save her own life, that she had consented to it.

David, thus happily escaped, went to Ramah to acquaint Samuel with the unwelcome news; and both of them went down to Naioth, which was not far from Ramah, and where was a school of prophets. It was not long before Saul heard of it, who sent immediately some messengers to fetch him. But they were no sooner come within sight of Samuel and the prophets, than they fell a prophesying likewise, and so returned without him. He sent others a second and a third time, with the same success, and at length resolved to go himself; and when he came, he prophesied likewise, till he came to the place, and there he cast off his cloaths, and laid down uncovered (H) all that day and night, and gave thereby an opportunity to David to get off [t], and to have a private interview with Jonathan, wherein they swore to each other a perpetual friendship. In this interview David obtained likewise a promise from him, that he would excuse him to his father, on the two following days, which were the feast of the new moon, and in which he was to have sat at the king's table, when he should be observed to be missing, and to let him know, whether he resented his absence, or was satisfied with the excuse. Accordingly, Saul missed him on the very first day, but imputed it to some accidental pollution, which made him unfit to appear; but when he saw him not on the next day, and was told by Jonathan, that he had begged leave to [t] Ch. xix. pass.

(H) The words in the original say, that he lay naked; but it were absurd to understand it in a literal sense, God having strictly forbidden all such indecencies (97), in opposition to the heathen priests, who were not ashamed to appear naked at some of their feasts (98). It is more than probable, therefore, that the words mean no more than the casting off that loose upper garment, which they used to throw over them when they went abroad *, and having nothing upon him but the tunic that was next the skin. Which manner of speaking was also common to the Greeks and Latins (99).

(97) Exod. xx. ver. ult. & alib. (98) Vid. Tit. Liv. & al. de Lupercal, &c. * See before p. 380. not. (H). (99) Vid. Gisbert. Cuper. Observ. lib. 1. cap. 7. Ant. Barreman. Dialog. lit. de poet. & proph. Fuller. Miscel. Theol. Heins. Grot. Hammond. Le Clerc. Le. Scene. Ess. on a new ver. pt. ii. c. 9. § 1.

go

go to a feaſt which was held in his family at Bethlehem, Saul was ſo enraged, that he upbraided him in the bittereſt terms with puſillanimous treachery; alledging, that he muſt never expect to ſit on his throne, till David was dead, and therefore ordered him to be immediately fetched to him. Here Jonathan ventured to plead for him, but he alſo narrowly eſcaped being killed by his father. Seeing then that his friend's death was reſolved, he went to the ſtone Ezel, a place appointed by them, and, at a ſignal given, David came out to him, and being fully informed how dangerous it was for him to ſtay any longer within the reach of his implacable enemy, they took a melancholy farewel of one another [u], and David haſted to the land of Nob, where Abimelech, the then high-prieſt, had his reſidence.

David was forced to diſpel the ſurpriſe the high-prieſt was in at his unexpected arrival, with a pretence of being ſent by the king upon ſome private buſineſs of importance; but having obſerved there one Doeg an Edomite, and one of Saul's ſhepherds, by whom he foreſaw he ſhould certainly be betrayed, if he made any ſtay, he told Abimelech, that his buſineſs was urgent, and begged that he would give him ſome refreſhment for himſelf and the young men that were with him. There was then none but the ſhew-bread that came off the holy table, which the prieſts alone were allowed to eat; but David, being afraid to ſtay the baking of ſome of the common ſort, prevailed upon him to overlook that ſcruple, aſſuring him, that both he and they were free from carnal defilement, and had been abſent from their wives above three days. As ſoon as they had refreſhed themſelves, David aſked him whether he could not furniſh him with ſome ſwords, or ſpears; and was anſwered, that there was no weapon there but the ſword which he took from Goliath, which he deſired might be brought to him; and having girt it on, he took his leave of the high-prieſt, and fled to Achiſh king of Gath. He made but a ſhort ſtay with that prince; for his ſervants who had not forgot what had been ſo lately ſung by the Iſraelitiſh women, that Saul had ſlain his thouſands, and David his ten thouſands, did not fail to remind him of it; which when David underſtood, the fear he was in of Achiſh, made him reſolve, if poſſible, to change his hatred either into pity or contempt. His ſtratagem ſucceeded according to his wiſh, and he acted the madman ſo well, that Achiſh, thinking him to be really ſo, was glad to be rid of him [w]; and David went and hid himſelf in the cave of Adullam.

[u] Ch. xx. paſſ. [w] Ch. xxi. paſſ. See Vol. II p. 222.

IN the mean time Saul, vexed at his heart to find that he was gone out of his reach, was ſtorming at Jonathan and at his own ſervants, as if they had all conſpired with the ſon of Jeſſe againſt him; when Doeg the Edomite came and acquainted him with what had paſſed at Nob, and how Abimelech had furniſhed David with proviſions and weapons, and had enquired of the Lord for him. This news put him into ſuch a rage, that, without giving himſelf leave to conſider, how far that high-prieſt might be ignorant of this unhappy difference between David and him, as it is plain from the text he really was; he ordered him and all his kindred to be brought immediately to him; and after many bitter invectives againſt them, for having leagued themſelves with his treacherous ſon-in-law, as he expreſſed it, he ſwore they ſhould all be put to death. Abimelech ſtrove in vain to convince him, that they were all really ignorant of David's having any ſiniſter deſign, whoſe behaviour had always been ſo commendable and upright, that they really believed him to have been ſent upon ſome important deſign by him. The exaſperated king would give no credit to them, but ordered his ſervants that ſtood about him to cut them all in pieces. However, as he ſaw that they expreſſed an uncommon reluctancy againſt ſtaining their hands with the blood of ſo many helpleſs prieſts, he commanded Doeg to perform that cruel office, which he immediately did. Saul, not contented to ſee fourſcore and five innocent perſons butchered at his feet, ordered a detachment to go and put the whole city of Nob to the ſword, men, women, children, and cattle; and this was alſo executed with ſuch barbarous ſpeed, that none but Abiathar, one of Abimelech's ſons, had the good fortune to eſcape. He went immediately to David, and acquainted him with the diſmal news; which was no more, he told him, than he foreſaw would happen, when he obſerved the Edomitiſh Doeg there. He ſaid all he could to comfort him, and deſired him to ſhare his fortune; promiſing that as ſoon as he was in a condition, he would raiſe him to the high-prieſthood; till when, he would be his ſafeguard, as long as he was able to defend his own life.

AMONG thoſe who followed David, were his father, mother, brethren, and other relations, with the prophet Gad, who were probably forced to fly to him for ſhelter from Saul's fury. Beſides theſe, there joined themſelves to him multitudes of debtors, and diſtreſſed and diſcontented perſons, to the number of 400. But the prophet Gad having told him, that it was no longer ſafe for him to abide in that place, he took his parents into the land of Moab, and left them under the protection of the king, whilſt his affairs continued in that deſperate perate condition †; and himſelf and his men went into the foreſt of Hareth in the land of Judah. However, he ſtayed no longer there than he reſcued the city of Keilah from the Philiſtines; for he heard ſoon after, that Saul, thinking himſelf ſure of him there, was coming againſt him with all ſpeed; and being afraid leſt the inhabitants of that place ſhould deliver him into his hands, and having had his fears confirmed by the high-prieſt, he removed from thence into the wilderneſs of Ziph with his own men, who were by this time increaſed to 600. Whilſt he was lurking about the rocks and caves of this place, Jonathan heard of it, and came to ſee him there. The deſign of this dangerous interview was to make ſtill ſurer of David's friendſhip, and to obtain a promiſe from him, that when he had gained the kingdom from his father, which he frankly told him he was well aſſured he would, himſelf might be the next in dignity to him; and that in caſe he died before that time, David ſhould ſhew the ſame friendly regard to his children, as he had done to him. This covenant was ratified with a freſh oath on both ſides, and Jonathan returned to his own houſe.

NOT long after this, Saul was informed by the Ziphites, that David lay concealed in their neighbourhood; and was ſo tranſported with joy at the news, that he could not forbear bleſſing them, as the only people that ſhewed any compaſſion for him. He deſired that they would go and watch him as narrowly as they could; for he told them, that he was a ſubtle enemy, and aſſured them, that he himſelf would come, with ſufficent force, to fetch him out of his lurking holes. But David, having got ſome intelligence of it, was by that time removed to the wilderneſs of Maon, on the ſouth of the plain of Jeſſimon. Saul was ſoon told of it, and purſued him thither, and pitched over againſt him, with a deſign to ſurround him; but as he was about it, news was brought him, that the Philiſtines had made a freſh incurſion into the land, ſo that he was forced to go back to put a ſtop to their progreſs *; leaving his enemy to recover himſelf of his fright, and to provide for his own ſafety. In memory of this deliverance, David called the rock where he then was, Selahamma-lekoth or the rock of diviſions; and preſently after removed with his little army to Engedi, and concealed himſelf among the ſtrong holds of that place ‡. Here Saul, who had ſoon driven away the Philiſtines, found him out again, and came againſt him with 3000 men; but, whilſt he was in ſearch of him, an urgent occaſion obliged him to retire, for decency ſake, into the cave where David lay concealed (I). David was immediately ſurrounded by his men, who told him that this was now the time, in which God had promiſed to deliver his enemy into his hand, and that he had it now in his power to put a final end, with one blow, to this unnatural war, and to free himſelf and them from all their miſery. David made as if he had liſtened to their advice, and, without telling them what he deſigned to do, roſe up, and ſtole ſoftly near Saul, and cut off the ſkirt of his robe (K), and gave him thereby an opportunity of eſcaping alive, whilſt he appeaſed his men's reſentment, with repreſenting to them, how heinous a crime it was to ſtretch forth a hand againſt their lawful prince and the Lord's anointed. He expreſſed even an uncommon remorſe at that which he had done, eſteeming it an indignity, or at leaſt a want of reſpect to the regal dignity; though he meant no more by it, than to give his father an irrefragable proof of his innocency and filial duty [y]. As ſoon therefore as Saul was got out of the cave, he called after him in the tendereſt manner, begged of him not to entertain ſuch unworthy

† See Vol. II. p. 92. * See Vol. II. p. 223. ‡ 1 Sam. xxiii. paſſ.

gent

David's generoſity to Saul.

[y] Ch. xxiv. 5.

(I) עין גדי Hen gedi, ſignifies the fountain of wild goats, and the city of that name was ſo called, from the multitude of goats and ſheep which were kept in the rocky parts that were in the neighbourhood of it. Theſe abounded with ſheep-cotes, and caverns, in which the cattle uſed to ſhelter themſelves during the heat of the day. It was into one of them that providence ſeems to have conducted Saul, to give David an opportunity, both of clearing himſelf from any treacherous deſign againſt him, and to give an inſtance of the greateſt generoſity that is to be met with in hiſtory, though at the hazard of becoming the victim of his men's reſentment, for refuſing the only opportunity of ridding himſelf of his enemy, and putting himſelf in a condition of rewarding their ſervices; for which he had all the cauſe in the world to fear, either being forſaken, or perhaps even betrayed by them into Saul's hands.

(K) the text ſays, that David and his men harboured in the ſides of the cave (100); or, as the original imports, in crags and holes of it, ſo that Saul coming into it from the broad day-light, could not perceive them; whilſt they, who had been there ſome time, might eaſily diſcover him, and know who he was, from his firſt entering into the place; ſo that it was eaſy for David to cut off a piece of his robe unperceived, eſpecially if we ſuppoſe it to have been the ſkirt of his upper garment, which, it is likely, they uſed to throw by, at a ſmall diſtance, upon ſuch occaſions.

(100) 1 Sam. xxiv. 3.

ſuſpicions

ſuſpicions of him, nor to liſten to the whiſpers of ſlandering tongues, ſince he had now given him ſo ſignal a proof, how much his heart abhorred the crimes for which he was ſo unjuſtly perſecuted. This humble and affecting ſpeech, backed with the infallible teſtimony of the piece of his robe, melted Saul into tears of tenderneſs and ſorrow: he acknowledged his ſon's ſuperior virtue and merit in ſparing his life, and in the concluſion owned, that he alone was worthy to ſit on the throne of Iſrael, which, he told him, he was now ſatisfied he would ſhortly do; and therefore, as a further proof of his unexampled generoſity and filial affection, he deſired him to ſwear to him, that he would not revenge the father's injuries upon any of his children, but that he would ſhew the ſame pity to the one, as he had now done to the other. David did readily give him that ſatisfaction, and after mutual embraces, Saul returned to Gibeah, and David and his men to their ſtrong hold [z] (L).

ABOUT this time the good old prophet Samuel died [a], in the ninety ſeventh or ninety eighth year of his age, greatly lamented by all true Iſraelites, and was buried at Ramah in his own houſe, or rather perhaps in his garden. He had judged Iſrael twenty years from Eli's death, and had lived about forty eight more from his anointing Saul to the regal dignity. As for David, whether he had any intelligence of Saul's relapſe, or whether his own fear ſuggeſted it to him, he removed further from the neighbourhood of Engedi towards the wilderneſs of Paran near to Maon, or Carmel, which was alſo in the tribe of Judah. It ſeems that David kept his men under ſuch ſtrict diſcipline, that inſtead of plundering the neighbouring places, as was generally done by ſuch men, they were rather a ſafe-guard to them, ſo that it was uſual for them

Samuel's death. Year of the Flood, 1940. Year before Chriſt 1059.

[z] Ibid. paſſ. [a] Ch. xxv. 1. & ſeq.

(L) It appears by this ſpeech of Saul, that he had by that time ſome certain knowledge, that David was the perſon whom God had choſen to be king in his ſtead, and perhaps alſo of his having been anointed by Samuel. So then his crime was not the bare perſecuting of an innocent perſon, or hunting after a flea, as David words it (1), but an impious deſire of fruſtrating the deſign of providence by cutting him off, in order to ſecure the crown to his own poſterity. It was therefore natural for him to intreat him for the ſafety of his own children, when he ſaw into what dangers his prepoſterous folly brought him, and that nothing but David's virtue could ſecure them from total exciſion.

(1) Ibid. ver. 14. & ſeq.

to

to expect ſome refeſhments from the inhabitants, as a gratification for their watchfulneſs and forbearance. Here then David, according to cuſtom, ſent a civil meſſage to a wealthy Carmelite named Nabal, who was then making a feaſt to his ſheep-ſhearers, and deſired him to ſend him and his men ſome portion of his good chear; but the man, who was rightly called Nabal, being naturally proud and brutiſh, ſent them away with a churliſh anſwer, that he had ſomething elſe to do with his proviſion, than to ſend it to ſuch a company of vagabonds. David, who could not but reſent ſuch ingratitude, was juſt upon the point of making ſome dreadful havock in Nabal's family, but by good fortune his prudent wife hearing of it, made ſuch haſte to bring him an elegant ſupply of refreſhment, that ſhe prevented all further miſchief; and David was ſo charmed with her prudent and modeſt behaviour, that he conceived a real affection for her. Abigail returned to her huſband, and on the next day, when ſleep had diſſipated the fumes of his wine, acquainted him with the danger which his brutiſhneſs was like to have brought upon him; and as he was of too baſe a nature to think David generous enough to forgive him, the dread which then ſeized him, did, in a few days, break his heart; which as ſoon as David heard of, he ſent for her and married her. As for Michal, Saul's daughter, ſhe had been given to another during his exile [b].

HE was forced ſoon after to retire from Maon into the deſert of Ziph, and the Ziphites failed not to acquaint Saul with it; who, having by that time forgot all that paſſed at their laſt interview, came out againſt him with three thouſand choſen men, and gave him a freſh opportunity of evidencing his innocency. The two armies were encamped, the one by the ſide of the hills of Hachilah, and the other in the wilderneſs over againſt it. David therefore ſent out ſome ſpies, to know whether Saul was come in perſon, and being informed that he was, he took Abiſhai with him, and came in the dead of the night into Saul's camp, where they found them all faſt aſleep; Saul in his tent, with his ſpear ſtuck into the ground by his bolſter, and Abner his general, with the reſt of his officers, encamped round his tent. Abiſhai began then to inſiſt ſtrenuouſly that providence had brought his enemy once more into his hand as a victim to the ſlaughter, and that if he miſſed ſo fair an opportunity of ſticking him to the ground with his own ſpear, he might in vain bewail his folly; but David ſoon ſtopped his hand, and contented himſelf with carrying away his ſpear, and the pitcher of water that lay under his head, which he did unperceived by any of Saul's men; God having thrown them all, as the text expreſſes it, into a deep ſleep[c], and ſoon after reached his own camp. Early on the next morning, he got up on the top of a high hill over againſt them, and having called Saul's general to him, he rebuked him ſharply for being ſo negligent of his maſter's perſon, as to ſuffer his ſpear and cruſe to be taken away by thoſe, who might with the ſame eaſe have taken away his life. Saul, who was ſoon appriſed of it, came out, and in the mildeſt terms acknowledged himſelf indebted a ſecond time for his life, to his generous, though much injured, ſon-in-law. David had then a fair occaſion to upbraid him with his injuſtice and cruelty, which he did, however, with expreſſions full of duty and humility; he repreſented unto him, how much beneath a king of Iſrael it was, to hunt after a poor harmleſs flea, or a partridge, who meant not the leaſt harm againſt him, and begged of him to deſiſt from perſecuting a man to death, who was not only innocent, but who ſhewed ſuch a tender regard for his life, when it was in his power. Saul could not reſiſt ſo ſtrong an evidence of his ſon's ſuperior virtue, which he muſt have admired even in an enemy. But though he ſhewed, at that juncture, all the tokens of remorſe, acknowledged his folly and injuſtice, and promiſed never to ſeek his life any more, yet David had ſo little reaſon to truſt to ſuch forced repentance, that as ſoon as they were parted, though with ſeeming tokens of the ſincereſt love and friendſhip, he reſolved to go far enough out of his reach[d]. He retired therefore once more to Achiſh king of Gath, deſigning to abide with him, till providence ſhould give a better turn to his affairs. The hoſpitable reception he met with from that prince has been ſeen before †; but here, though he found ſo generous a friend and protector, yet an unexpected misfortune befel him from another quarter, which was like to have proved as fatal to him, as if he had fallen into his enemy's hand.

A ſecond inſtance of David's mercy.

[b] Ibid.

DURING his abode at Ziklag, the place which the Gathiſh king had allotted him, which was a year and four months, there repaired unto him ſome of Saul's kindred, and multitudes of valiant men and commanders out of the tribes of Benjamin and Judah, and ſome from that of Gad, which ventured to paſs the Jordan to come to him, even at the time when it overflowed its banks (M), beſides ſome of the tribe of

[c] Ch. xvi. 12. [d] Ch. xxii. 1, & ſeq. † See Vol. II. p. 223.

(M) The book of Chronicles obſerves of theſe Gadites, that they could handle the ſhield and the buckler, that their faces were as the of Manaſſeh [c]. With theſe he uſed to make incurſions into the countries of the Geſhurites, Gerzites, and Amalekites (N) unknown to the king *, who was made to believe, that he made them into the land of Judah; and this gained him ſuch confidence, that he had taken him and his army to go with him againſt Saul [f]; but whilſt they were gone, the Amalekites came and took Ziklag, and burnt it, and carried away all their women, children, cattle, and all the plunder of the place. When therefore they were returned from the Philiſtine camp, from which they had been diſmiſſed by the jealous princes of that nation, and found what a terrible deſtruction had been as thoſe of lions, and that they were as ſwift of foot as the wild roes (2). The ſame author takes notice, that when David ſaw ſuch numbers of the Benjamites, eſpecially of Saul's kindred, come to him, he was apprehenſive they came with a deſign to ſurpriſe and carry him off. It ſeems even by what he ſaid to them, that in ſuch a caſe he was not able to oppoſe them with his ſix hundred men. For, ſays he, if you are come with a friendly deſign to ſuccour me, my heart ſhall be knit with yours; but if your intent be to betray me to my enemies, I leave it to God to puniſh you for your treachery (3). But they ſoon diſpelled his fears, by aſſuring him, that they were intirely in his intereſt, and reſolved to ſhare his fortune, and to be under his command.

[c] See 1 Chron. xii. 1, 15, & ſeq. * See Vol. II. p. 224.
[f] 1 Sam. xxviii. 1.

As to the time of David's abode at Ziklag, though we have followed our Engliſh verſion and archbiſhop Uſher, the original ſays only, that he continued there ימים וארבעה חדשים, days and four months, which ſome think to imply ſome days above, rather than a year and four months; becauſe David came thither after Samuel's death, and left it immediately after that of Saul, and they reckon but ſeven months between the death of thoſe two perſons (4).

(N) We beg leave to obſerve here, againſt thoſe who condemn David as guilty of a great breach of hoſpitality, that none of theſe three nations were Philiſtines. The two former were the remains of the old Canaanites (5), and the Amalekites the deſcendants of Eſau (6), and all the three under the divine anathema. Notwithſtanding which, David might think it proper to tell the king, that he made his inroads into the land of Iſrael, that he might think himſelf the more ſure of him; and this is the very reaſon aſſigned in the text for his uſing that pretence (7).

(2) 1 Chron xii. 8. (3) 1 Chron. xii. 17. (4) See Vol. II. p. 155, note (I). 2 Sam. i. 1. & 1 Sam. xxvii. 7. & Munſt. in Sam. xxvii. ſub not. 6. (5) Vid Joſh. xii. 5. & xxvi. 3. (6) See Vol. II. p. 148. (7) 1 Sam. xxvii. ult.

made

made of their city. they filled the air with their cries, Their deſtroying of men, women, and children, in all their former incurſions, gave them no room to doubt, that their own had undergone the ſame fate; ſo that their grief and deſpair roſe to ſuch a height, that David was like to have become the victim of it. The men began to talk of ſtoning him, as the cauſe of this miſchief; when he, ſtill confiding in God, called Abiathar to conſult the Lord for him, whether he had beſt purſue after that troop; and upon his being anſwered that he ſhould do it with ſucceſs, he took ſix hundred men with him, overtook and deſtroyed the Amalekitiſh band, and recovered all that had been taken from them, as we have ſeen elſewhere †.

AFTER this ſignal deliverance David's affairs began to take a better turn, and the death of Saul, which happened immediately after, not only rid him of an inveterate enemy, the cauſe of all theſe troubles, but opened a fair and eaſy way to the crown, at leaſt over his own tribe. The particulars of this ſignal defeat, which coſt Saul and his three Sons their lives, and among them the brave and generous Jonathan, need not be repeated here ‡. One or two circumſtances however preceded it, with relation to that unhappy monarch, which made his condition ſo deplorable and deſperate, that we could not with juſtice omit them. He ſaw himſelf on the eve of being attacked by a powerful army, whilſt a great number of his own, eſpecially the chiefs, were gone over to David, and perhaps he had alſo intelligence of his being come with the Philiſtines againſt him: he had killed all the prieſts except Abiathar, who was alſo fled to David, ſo that he could not conſult the Lord by Urim: Samuel was dead, and not a prophet left to adviſe him. In this ſtreight, he would gladly have ſought for counſel from witches or wizards, but he had long ago baniſhed them all out of his dominions. At length, with much enquiring, they found him out a woman at Endor, who had a familiar ſpirit, to whom he went diſguiſed in the night; and, having promiſed her ſecrecy, prevailed upon her to raiſe him up Samuel. She did ſo accordingly; but when ſhe ſaw him appear, either in a different manner than ſhe had been uſed to (O), or in ſuch a manner as gave her to underſtand, that it was Saul

† See Vol. II. p. 155, & ſeq. ‡ See Vol. II. p. 225.

(O) It is not eaſy to ſay, whether her fright proceeded from the extraordinarineſs of the apparition, or from the fear ſhe was in, that Saul had only ſet her to work that he might have occaſion to puniſh her for it. The latter ſeems the moſt probable, by what

Saul consults the witch of Endor.

Saul himself that had set her on work; she gave a shriek, and complained, that she had been imposed upon. Saul bid her go on, assuring her she should be safe, and asked what she had seen; she answered, Gods, angels, or judges, (for the word may signify any of these) ascending out of the earth. She described one, who was an old man covered with a mantle, whom Saul understood to be Samuel, and to whom he bowed himself to the ground. Here the apparition, or, as the text expresses it, Samuel asked him the reason why he had disturbed and called him up; and Saul owned to him that the distress he was in from the Philistine army, being destitute of counsel from God, had obliged him to take that way to obtain his advice what he should do under those difficulties. But Samuel answered, Why dost thou ask my advice, seeing thy disobedience to God's commands hath alienated him from thee, and that thy kingdom is given to David? And now, continued the vision, the Lord is going to give up the Israelites into the hands of their enemies, and thou and thy sons shall be with me to-morrow (P). At these last words the frighted king, who had eaten nothing she said to him in her fright; and yet it is not impossible, that she was also surprised at the strangeness of the sight. The text doth not say how she came to know the king by it; and the notion of the Jews, that the spirits, which she raised by enchantment, used to rise out of the earth with their heels uppermost, and that Samuel came up upon his feet, by which she knew that it was Saul that wanted to consult him (8), is altogether ludicrous; but if it was the real apparition of that prophet that she saw, as we shall at least make it probable in the next note that it was, she might easily suppose, that he would not have appeared in that extraordinary manner to any but to the king of Israel. For as to the notion that it was all done by legerdemain and ventriloqui on the woman's part, and by strength of fancy and fear in Saul's, we cannot by any means come into it, and shall give our reasons for dissenting from it in its proper place.

(P) There is hardly a passage in the Old Testament that has been more canvassed and tortured, by authors of all ages, than this we are upon; and when a man has read them all, he will be forced to own, that there are difficulties in whatever sense he takes the history of Samuel's apparition. We have therefore taken that which seems the most natural and obvious, and shall now give our reasons for preferring it to the rest.

First then, as to the notion of its being performed by ventriloqui, juggle, or confederacy; besides that it doth too great a violence

(8) Vid. Munst. in loc.

nothing all that day, fainted away, and fell flat on the ground, and remained ſpeechleſs for ſome time. His men, at length, to the text, and would be a kind of burleſque upon its author; it is not likely, that a woman, cunning enough to carry on a trade of this nature, would have been ſo impolitic as to give Saul ſuch a dreadful anſwer; though we ſhould grant that ſhe was ſo well acquainted with the bad circumſtances of that prince, that ſhe might foreſee that it was likely to prove the caſe; ſuch people are rather apt to flatter thoſe that conſult them, and the fear ſhe was in, when ſhe knew Saul, would no doubt have put her upon this rather than upon the former. Add to this, that ſuch a terrible denunciation, would only have proved the moſt effectual means of putting Saul upon any expedient to avoid it, whether by flight, or by any other way, rather than by engaging the enemy.

This laſt argument is equally ſtrong againſt thoſe who think, that the devil took the ſhape, and acted the part of Samuel; unleſs we could ſuppoſe him ſo well acquainted with futurity, that he was ſure Saul would ruſh into his own deſtruction, notwithſtanding he was ſo ſignally forewarned of it Again, though we grant that he might foreſee, that the enemy would be too ſtrong for Saul and his army, yet he could neither be ſure that he would engage them, eſpecially after ſuch a dreadful diſſuaſive, nor, if he did, that he would certainly be killed, he and his three ſons. The Iſraelites had won many a more unlikely victory, and, at the worſt, they might have eſcaped by flight. We need not obſerve farther, how unnatural and abſurd it is to ſuppoſe, that the inſpired writer would have expreſſed himſelf as he doth, and have introduced the dead prophet as raiſed from the dead and ſpeaking to Saul, if the devil had been the ſole actor in his ſhape; neither do we think it at all probable, that the devil if it had been he that ſpoke to Saul, would have played the ſaint ſo far, as to reprove him for his wickedneſs and diſobedience, but eſpecially for making uſe of an art to raiſe him up, which he was too fond of to diſcountenance in ſuch a ſevere manner.

It is indeed urged here, that there were two falſities in this pretended prophecy, which none therefore but either the father of lies, or a juggling old woman, could be the author of. The firſt is, that the viſion ſays to Saul, thou and thy ſons ſhall be with me — Now ſay they, Saul died like a reprobate by his own hands, and could not be where Samuel was, in the manſions of the bleſſed. But who doth not ſee that it meant no more than, thou ſhalt be dead, or, in the other world as I now am. The other is, that the viſion ſays to-morrow, whereas the battle was not fought on the next day, but a day or two after. But though this were granted, it doth not follow, that the word מָחָר Mahar doth poſitively imply here, that very next day following; it doth often ſignify ſhortly, and ſometimes hereafter, in proceſs of time; as when Moſes ſays, when thy children

ſhall

length, came and raiſed him up, and the old woman beſought him, in the humbleſt terms, that he would take ſome ſuſte-
nance

ſhall ask thee, Mahar, hereafter, what meaneth ſuch a ceremony or feſtival, and ſo on—We ſhall for once diſpenſe with mentioning the numerous authors of theſe two laſt opinions, to avoid filling up near a whole page with quotations.

Upon the whole then, we think, with the far greater number of authors, antient and modern, that it was really Samuel that appeared to the woman, and foretold Saul's death and Iſrael's defeat. This appears likewiſe to have been the opinion of the antient Jews, from what we read in the book of Eccleſiaſticus (9), where it is ſaid, that after his death he [Samuel] propheſied, and ſhewed the king his end; that he lift up his voice from the earth in propiecy, to blot out the wickedneſs of the people. This, we have already obſerved, is the moſt obvious and natural ſenſe of the text. We can ſee but two objections that can be made againſt it, and though we have premiſed, at the beginning of this note, that every opinion hath its difficulties, yet we hope we ſhall leſſen theſe ſo far, that they will appear inconſiderable, in compariſon of thoſe we have urged againſt the other two,

The firſt objection is, that it were abſurd to ſuppoſe, that the devil has ſo much power over the ſouls of the dead, eſpecially of the ſaints, as to make them appear viſibly at the deſire of a conjurer; to which it may be anſwered, that there is no neceſſity for ſuppoſing here any ſuch extraordinary power in the devil; but rather that God did cauſe Samuel to appear to Saul, to reprove him for his former, and for this laſt ſin in particular, of ſeeking for helps from wizards, contrary to his expreſs commands; and to bring him thereby, if poſſible, to ſuch a ſenſe of his faults, as might prevent his making ſuch a deſperate exit; and that all this happened contrary to the woman's expectation, who could not be ignorant that it was above the power of her art to evocate the ſouls of the bleſſed, and wanted only to impoſe one of her familiar ſpirits upon him, and to ſupply the reſt by policy. It is therefore no wonder that ſhe was ſo terribly ſurpriſed, when, inſtead of one of her imps, ſhe beheld the real apparition of that venerable prophet.

But here it will be objected again, that it is very improbable, that God, who had refuſed to anſwer Saul, either by Urim or by prophets, ſhould now do it, at leaſt ſeemingly, by the miniſtry of a wicked woman. But here it muſt be obſerved; 1. That the text doth not imply, that the Lord refuſed to anſwer him by Urim or by prophets, but that he had not the means of conſulting by them; for how could he conſult by Urim, when the high-prieſt was with David in the Philiſtine army? 2. Were it true that

(9) xlvi. ver. ult.

God

nance before he went away, to which after long importunity he conſented. She then went and dreſſed a fatted calf, and ſet it before them, and as ſoon as they had refreſhed themſelves they went their way, and reached their army before break of day [s]. A dreadful battle ſoon enſued, which fulfilled all that had been foretold to Saul, whoſe fear of being taken alive, and ill uſed by his enemies, rather than the wounds he received from them (Q), made him ruſh upon his own ſword, to put an end to his unfortunate life. Here the victorious Philiſtines could not forbear venting their reſentment on his dead body and thoſe of his ſons; they mangled and hung them upon the walls of Bethſhan; which being near

His death.

Year of the Flood, 1944. Year before Chriſt 1055.

[s] 1 Sam. xxviii. paſſ.

God had refuſed to anſwer him in the ordinary ways of Urim and the like, yet it doth not follow, that he might not do it in an extraordinary one, in order to make the greater impreſſion upon him, whoſe character is to have been but too regardleſs of God's commands, when communicated to him by the prophet: he might likewiſe be ſuffered to ſeek for counſel from a witch, to make him ſenſible what degree of impiety he had brought himſelf into; ſo that God's ſending Samuel to reprove him for it, was a ſignal way of diſcountenancing ſuch a wicked and forbidden practice.

However, we do not pretend to remove all difficulties that can be raiſed againſt this opinion, but only to ſhew, that it is attended with fewer, and leſs, than the other two. For this reaſon we ſhall carry our enquiry no farther: whether it were the real ſoul of Samuel, or an angel aſſuming his ſhape: whether Saul ſaw, or only heard him ſpeak; and many others, concerning which we ſhould loſe ourſelves in a labyrinth, almoſt as dark and intricate, as thoſe do, who ſuppoſe that two ſuch remarkable events, as the death of Saul and his three ſons, and the total defeat of the Iſraelitiſh army, could be foretold ſo poſitively and exactly, either by a juggling woman, or by the devil, or indeed by any but an omniſcient power.

(Q) Notwithſtanding what has been ſaid elſewhere †, of Saul's receiving ſeveral wounds before he fell upon his ſword, for want of attending more to the original than to ours and other verſions; we beg leave to obſerve here, that in this place and in the Chronicles, where the account of Saul's death is repeated, the root of the verb is חוּל Chull, which ſignifies to be in dread, in pangs, and alludes to the travail of a woman, &c. and not חָלַל Challal, to wound. So that it doth not appear, that he was at all wounded, but only in the extremity of fear, when he ſaw himſelf ſo thick beſet with enemies, that there was no way to eſcape (10).

† See Vol. II. p. 225.

(10) Vid. chald paraphr. Munſt. & al. in loc.

the

the field of battle, had been probably abandoned by the inhabitants, as many others were after this defeat. But the grateful Jabeſhites, remembering how Saul had ſaved them formerly from loſing their eyes and liberty, did ſoon after ſend ſome of their braveſt men to reſcue them; which was no ſooner done than they gave them an honourable burial, and kept a ſeven days faſt in memory of their deaths [h].

David had been returned from the ſlaughter of the plunderers of Ziklag about two or three days, when he received the news of Saul's and Jonathan's death by an Amalekite, who alſo brought him Saul's crown and bracelets. How glad ſoever David might be to hear of his enemy's death, yet that of his beloved Jonathan touched him to the heart, and the great defeat of the Iſraelites cauſed a general mourning and faſting in his whole army. As for the meſſenger, he, having unadviſedly pretended to have given Saul his laſt wound at his deſire, was ordered to immediate death, for having lifted up his hand againſt the Lord's anointed. David did greatly mourn the unhappy fate of the father and ſon, and their deaths inſpired his poetic genius with one of the fineſt elegies that ever were penned, which he cauſed to be tranſmitted to future ages [i].

As ſoon as they had done mourning for Saul, he conſulted the Lord which way he ſhould ſteer his courſe next; and being commanded to remove to Hebron, he brought thither his two wives, his relations, and army. Here he was again anointed king over Judah by thoſe of that tribe, who came to him in multitudes; whilſt Abner, Saul's general, took his ſon Iſh-boſheth, who was then forty years old, and proclaimed him king of Iſrael at Mahanaim. Thus was the kingdom divided between theſe two, each enjoying his own ſhare quietly, without moleſting the other, during the ſpace of two years (R), the tribe of Judah cleaving to David, and the

Iſh-boſheth ſucceeds him.

[h] Ibid. cap. ult. ver. 4. See Vol. II. p. 225. [i] 2 Sam. i. ver. 17. & ſeq.

(R) At leaſt this ſeems to be the ſenſe of thoſe words, and Iſh-boſheth reigned two years (11); for it is plain he reigned much longer, but not peaceably. Much the ſame was ſaid of the beginning of Saul's reign (12). Abner alſo might think it proper to take him to Mahanaim, which was beyond Jordan, that, being free from the Philiſtines, he might have time to recruit his ſhattered army.

(11) 2 Sam. ij. 10. (12) 1 Sam. xiii. 1. Uſſer. Ann. p. 35.

reſt, at leaſt the moſt part, to Iſh-boſheth. The firſt popular thing David did after this, was to ſend a meſſage of thanks to the inhabitants of Jabeſh-gilead, for the regard they had paid to the bodies of the deceaſed king and his ſons. After which he married Maacah, the daughter of Talmai, king of Geſhur [k], by whom he had afterwards Abſalom and Tamar [l]. But we cannot think, with our learned Uſher, that he contracted an affinity with that prince to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt his rival *; that being expreſly forbid by the law of Moſes. It is more probable, that he took her priſoner in one of his excurſions againſt that country, as we ſhall ſhew in a following note. At the end of two years, Abner, having repaſſed the Jordan with his army, came and incamped on one ſide of the pool of Gibeon; and Joab, the ſon of Zeruiah, David's general, came and incamped over againſt him on the other ſide.

HITHERTO there had paſſed no hoſtilities, nor any war been declared between the two monarchs; and their ſubjects on both ſides being all Iſraelites, there was a neceſſity of making ſome kind of hoſtile overture, which might bring on an engagement; the two generals therefore bethought themſelves of the following ſtrange one. They agreed to ſend twelve brave men out of each army, to meet in a proper place between them, under pretence of performing ſome warlike exerciſe; but they were no ſooner come within reach of one another, than each man took his antagoniſt by the head, and ſheathed his ſword in his body; ſo that they were all killed upon the ſpot. In memory of this bloody feat, the place was called Helkath-hazzurim, the field of the ſtrong men. There needed no more to ſet the two armies on fighting, and a dreadful battle immediately enſued, in which Abner's army was totally routed, and himſelf forced to fly for his life. Joab had two brave brothers with him, one of whom, named Aſahel, was exceeding ſwift of foot, and he purſued after him with uncommon ſpeed, with a deſign to take him priſoner. Abner was ſoon aware of it, and, turning about, adviſed him once and again to deſiſt from his purſuit, and to content himſelf with a priſoner of leſs note; but Aſahel ſtill perſiſting, Abner was forced to run him through the body with the hinder part of his ſpear. The ſight of his dead body cauſed ſuch a general ſtop in the flying remains of his army, that he was forced to cauſe it to be removed out of the road, and covered with a garment, that his men might have time to ſhun Joab's victorious hoſt, who were following cloſe at their heels. The purſuit laſted till ſun-ſet, by which time they were got as far as the hill of Ammah, within ſight of Giah, along the wilderneſs of Gibeon. Here the Benjamites rallied themſelves again under Abner, and poſted themſelves on the riſing of the hill, reſolved to make a ſtout defence; but their general, who was weary of fighting, called to Joab, and deſired him to put a ſtop to the ſlaughter of his brethren, whoſe deſtruction could not but cauſe bitterneſs in the end. Joab hearkened to him, and cauſed the trumpet to ſound a retreat; after which, Abner and his men took the way of Mahanaim, and Joab returned to Hebron. There were but nineteen men killed on David's ſide, beſides Aſahel, but Benjamin loſt 360. Aſahel's body was carried to Bethlehem, and buried in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors[m]; and from that time David grew ſtronger every day, and Iſh-boſheth weaker and weaker; but the war between thoſe two did not end but with the death of the latter, which happened ſhortly after.

[k] 2 Sam. iii. 3. [l] Ib. ch. xiii. 1. * Annal p. 35.

IN the mean time, Abner, who had uſed all his endeavours to ſtrengthen his maſter's party, did ſet ſuch value upon his own ſervices, that he made no ſcruple to have a criminal intercourſe with one of Saul's concubines, named Rizpah; and when he was reprimanded for it by Iſh-boſheth (S), he reſented it ſo highly, that he ſwore, that he would from that minute become a friend to David, and bring all the tribes under his obedience. He delayed not to make his words good, by ſending meſſengers privately, firſt to David, and then to the elders of Iſrael, to contrive a revolt; after which, he found out the following pretence for going to David unſuſpected. That monarch had ſent to Iſh-boſheth, to deſire of him to ſend him his wife Michal, whom Saul, during his exile, had married to another; and Abner, having obtained an order from him to demand her of her huſband, took upon him to convey her ſafe to David. Whether Iſh-boſheth had any ſuſpicion of him or not, yet his circumſtances were ſo

[m] 2 Sam. ii. paſſ.

(S) It appears by the ſequel of the Jewiſh hiſtory, that it was a very high crime, amounting to no leſs than treaſon, to marry a king's widow (13); much more muſt it have been ſo to debauch her, as Abner did Rizpah. So that Iſh-boſheth, notwithſtanding his obligations to that general, could not well avoid reſenting ſuch an affront being offered to the royal dignity, as came little ſhort of an attempt upon his crown.

(13) Vid. 1 Kings ii. 13, & ſeq.

tottering

tottering, that he dared not refuſe him any thing; ſo Abner went accompanied with twenty men, and preſented Michal to David, and was graciouſly received by him. But as he was returning home, Joab, unknown to David, ſent for him back to Hebron, under ſome friendly pretence, and killed him as ſoon as he was come to the gate of the city, under pretence indeed of revenging his brother Aſahel's death; but much more likely to rid himſelf of ſo powerful a rival. As ſoon as David heard of it, he proteſted his innocence of that bloody deed, and vented his reſentment in imprecations againſt the author of it; after which he cauſed Abner to be decently buried, and accompanied his corpſe to the grave, with all the tokens of ſorrow and reſpect[n]. However, as he knew himſelf as yet too weak to diſoblige Joab, whoſe power among the people might eaſily have turned the ſcale againſt him, he was forced to ſuppreſs his grief and reſentment for the treacherous murder of ſo conſiderable a perſon.

Iſh-boſheth did ſoon hear of his death; and, as he had been the main ſupport of his kingdom, both he and his men began to fear, that David would ſoon be too ſtrong for him. This inſpired two of his captains, brethren of the family of the Beerothites, Baanah and Rechab, to conſpire againſt his life, in hopes of recommending themſelves to David by it. They took the opportunity of the heat of the day, when he was lain down on his bed, to come into his houſe, under pretence of fetching their allowance of corn, and to enter into his chamber, where they barbarouſly murdered him; and having cut off his head fled away with it unperceived to Hebron, and preſented it to David, congratulating him upon the death of his competitor. It was hardly to be expected, that David, who had puniſhed the young Amalekite with death, for barely pretending to have killed Saul, could forbear expreſſing a much greater horror at this more inhuman regicide, or inflict a milder puniſhment upon the authors of it, whatever advantage his affairs might reap from it. Accordingly he commanded them to be immediately put to death, and their hands and feet to be cut off, and hung up over the pool of Hebron. As for the head of Iſh-boſheth, he cauſed it to be buried in the ſepulchre of Abner, which was alſo in the ſame city[o].

Iſh-boſheth murdered.

David by this time had reigned over Judah in Hebron about ſeven years and half; and when the reſt of the tribes heard of Iſh-boſheth's death they aſſembled themſelves, and came to anoint him king over all Iſrael, and to pay their homage to him. These are reckoned, in another place [p], to have amounted to the number of 320,000 men and upwards, all ready armed, and expert warriors, out of all the twelve tribes, except part of that of Benjamin, which did still stick to the house of Saul. David received them with joy, and feasted them at Hebron during three days; all that time, not only his own and the neighbouring tribes, but even some of the more distant ones, pouring in plenty of provisions upon them [q].

David reigns over all the 12 tribes.

[n] 2 Sam. iii. See before, p. 363.

[o] Ch. iv. paſſ.

ON the next year, David went and besieged Jerusalem, a place of such strength, that it had stood out till that time against the united force of Judah and Simeon. Here Joab shewed so much bravery and conduct, that he was made head general of Israel [r]: he beat the Jebusites that defended it, and carried the fortress of Sion, or Zion, by assault †, which David made his residence from that time. He inlarged and fortified it from Millo inward round about, and called it the city of David, whilst Joab rebuilt the rest of the city, and surrounded it with a strong wall [s]; and from that time it became the metropolis of Judæa.

BUT it was impossible for him to carry on such a work, without alarming the jealous Philistines, who could not be ignorant either of the strength of his army, or of his now reigning over all Israel without a competitor. They came therefore so suddenly upon him, that they took Bethlehem, and put a garison into it, before he could make any resistance, whilst he was forced to retire to the cave of Adullam for present safety [t]. It was here, that having expressed a longing desire for some of the water of the well of Bethlehem, three of his chief worthies ventured through the enemy's host, which was encamped along the valley of Rephaim, and fetched him some water from thence. However, when they brought it to him, he chose rather to spill it upon the ground than to drink it, seeing, as he said, they had procured it at the hazard of their lives [u]. He then enquired of the Lord, whether he should fall upon the Philistines; and having received a favourable answer, he discomfited them so effectually, both at this time, and upon a second attempt of theirs, that they were never more able to make head against him, or any of his successors [w]. David finding himself thus strengthened,

[p] Comp. 1 Chron. xii. 23, & seq. with xi. 1, 2, & seq. [q] Ibid. xii. ver. ult. [r] 2 Sam. v. 8. 1 Chr. xi. 6. † See Vol. II. p. 186. [s] Comp. 2 Sam. v. 9. & 1 Chron. xi. 7, & seq. [t] Ibid. xi. 15, & seq. [u] Ibid. xi. 17, & seq. [w] Ibid. xiv. 10, & seq. See Vol. II. p. 188.

ſtrengthened, his army numerous and well diſciplined, under the conduct of more than thirty worthies, who had all ſignalized themſelves by ſome extraordinary exploits, and his enemies ſo thoroughly weakened, made a firm alliance with Hiram king of Tyre, by whom he was furniſhed with cedars and other woods, and with expert workmen, to build him a palace in his own city. He likewiſe increaſed the number of his wives and concubines, by whom he had a conſiderable number of children born at Jeruſalem, beſides thoſe that were born to him in Hebron (T); all which did not a little contribute to his grandeur as well as happineſs.

SUCH a ſeries of ſucceſſes, and the univerſal peace which then reigned through the whole kingdom, inſpired that pious prince with the higheſt ſentiments of gratitude and religion, and with a deſire of making his city the centre, as it were, of God's worſhip, by tranſporting the ſacred ark His gratitude.

(T) David is recorded to have had ſix wives in Hebron, beſides Saul's daughter, who was then with another huſband. He is ſaid to have had a ſon by every one of the ſix former; by which is hardly meant that he had but one by each, but that the text mentions only their firſt-born (14). As for Maacah the daughter of the king of Geſhur, the Jews affirm, that David had taken her captive, and forced her to embrace the Jewiſh religion; becauſe it was forbid by the law of Moſes to contract any affinity with the heathens. Either of theſe is far from improbable, becauſe we read of his making ſome excurſions againſt the Geſhurites during his abode at Ziklag (15); but nothing of his contracting ſuch a forbidden affinity with their king. Neither indeed is it likely, that ſo zealous a man as David was, would have married her before ſhe had renounced her idolatry. But as to what they add, of his forcing her to turn Jew againſt her will, and that the ill hap of her two children, Abſalom and Tamar, the former of whom turned rebel againſt his father, and the latter was raviſhed by David's eldeſt ſon, was inflicted on him as a puniſhment for that violence (16), we ſhall not venture to affirm any thing about it.

How many wives and concubines he took, after he came from Hebron, the text doth not ſay, but mentions only, that he had ten ſons by them; by which the Talmudiſts gather, that he had ſixteen in all, beſides Michal, who being barren, was to be excepted out of that number. Hence they have paſſed it into a law, that a king ought to have no more wives than eighteen (17); and they believe, that all Solomon's miſcarriages were owing to his venturing to exceed that number †.

(14) 2 Sam. iii. 2. & ſeq. (15) 1 Sam. xxvii 7, 8. (16) Vid. Munſt. 2 Sam. iii. ſub. not. 6. (17) Vid. Præc. Negat. ccxxii. † See before p. 299. not. (R) thither,

thither, which had continued almoſt fifty years at Kirjath-jearim (V), and placing it in one of the beſt apartments of his new palace. He conſulted the elders and chiefs of Iſrael upon it, and being anſwered with the univerſal approbation of the aſſembly, he diſpatched meſſengers through the whole kingdom to invite all the prieſts and Levites, and as many of the people as were ſo diſpoſed, to come to the ſolemnity. The ark was accordingly ſet upon a new cart, and brought from Abinadab's houſe to Jeruſalem, accompanied by David and his court, by multitudes of prieſts and Levites, who ſang and played upon various inſtruments, and by a numerous concourſe of people from all parts of the kingdom. But their joy was ſuſpended by an accident, which filled the king and aſſembly with wonder and fear. The ark was come to Nachon's threſhing-floor (W), when the oxen that drew it, ſtarting at ſomething, were like to have overſet the cart; to prevent which, Uzzah, one of Abinadab's ſons, who drove it, clapt his hand upon the ark in a ſurpriſe, and was for his preſumption ſmitten with immediate death (X). David could not

(V) Archbiſhop Uſher reckons, that it was on the firſt ſabbatical year that it was brought from Gilgal to Shiloh, and that it was likewiſe upon ſuch another year that it was removed from Kirjath-jearim to the city of David; and that the 68th pſalm was ſung by the people who accompanied this ſolemn proceſſion (18).

(W) Though we have followed our verſion, it ſeems to us more probable, that the word נכון Nachon, is rather a participle than a proper name, and ſignifies ready fitted, or proper, becauſe we find that David ſtopped at proper diſtances to offer ſacrifices; and this ſeems to be one of them; and perhaps alſo it might be either the killing of the victims, or ſomething relating to thoſe ſacrifices, that made the oxen to ſtart. There was moreover a very great irregularity in placing the ark upon a cart; which according to the law of Moſes, ought to have been carried by the prieſts upon their ſhoulders. This accident therefore made him ſo ſenſible of his error, that the author of the book of the Chronicles obſerves, that he acknowledged it to the prieſts at the next removal of the ark, and cauſed them to bear it upon their ſhoulders to his houſe (19).

(X) This ſudden and ſevere puniſhment upon Uzzah for his indiſcreet zeal, which David himſelf could not forbear being much ſurpriſed and diſpleaſed at (20), has given ſo much offence to ſome interpreters, that they have ſought for a quite different ſenſe of the words

(18) Ann. p. 36. (19) 1 Chron. xv. 11, & ſeq. (20) 2 Sam. vi. 6.

not forbear expreſſing a more than ordinary grief at this ſeverity, which made him call the place Perez-uzzah, that is the breach or puniſhment of Uzzah, and reſolve to have the ark depoſited in the houſe of Obed-edom, the ſon of Jeduthun[x], ſurnamed the Gittite, probably, becauſe he was a native of Gath-rimmon, a city allotted to the tribe of Levi[y], where it continued about three months. David finding ſoon after that God had bleſſed that Levite in an extraordinary manner, ever ſince the ark had been under his roof, reſolved to procure a ſhare of thoſe divine bleſſings by removing it to his own houſe. However, he took care to have it performed in a more regular manner, by preparing a ſumptuous tabernacle for it, by aſſembling the prieſts, and cauſing them to bear it according to God's command, by offering ſacrifices at every ſix paces (Y), and by ſhewing an uncommon joy upon that ſolemn occaſion.

[x] 1 Chron. xiii. [y] See Joſh. xxi. 24, 25.

words in order to make his crime greater than is commonly apprehended. It is true, that the original runs literally thus, and Uzzah ſent and ſeized the ark, for the cattle ſhook. From which they would conclude, that he rather offered ſome indignity to it, than endeavoured to prevent its falling. But, beſides that this is contrary to all the antient verſions and to the book of the Chronicles, where this fact is more clearly related, it is certain, that if that had been the caſe, David would have expreſſed his reſentment againſt him, and not againſt God for puniſhing him. Uzzah, being a Levite, ought to have remembered, that it was forbid, under pain of death (21), to any, but the prieſts, to touch the ark; and even theſe were only to touch the ſtaves by which it was carried, which for that reaſon were never to be taken from it. It may alſo be, that Uzzah was the contriver of this new way of carrying the ark upon a cart, inſtead of the prieſts ſhoulders. However, if his puniſhment ſhould ſtill ſeem too ſevere, one may ſuppoſe, that God ſuffered it to be ſo, in order to inſpire the people with a greater reſpect and awe for that ſacred ſymbol of his preſence, than they were naturally inclined to.

(Y) This we take to be the meaning of the text here (22), though it only ſays, that when the bearers had proceeded ſix ſteps, he offered a bullock, &c. But ſome think, that Uzzah having been ſtruck dead within ſix yards of his own houſe, David cauſed theſe ſacrifices to be made at the firſt ſix ſteps of the prieſts, to intreat the Lord to be more favourable this time (23). But we find in (21) Vid. Num. iv. paſſ. & ver. 15. (22) 2 Sam. vi. ver. 13.

(23) Vid. Munſt. in loc.

tho

His zeal. casion. For he put on a linen ephod, and danced before the ark at the ſound of a great number of inſtruments, inſomuch that Michal, who ſaw the proceſſion through a window, could not forbear deſpiſing and reflecting upon him, for acting, as ſhe thought, ſo far beneath a king of Iſrael. As ſoon as the ark was depoſited in the tabernacle, he offered a large quantity of burnt and peace-offerings; and having feaſted the great concourſe of people who came to the city, he diſmiſſed them to their own homes [z].

THE ark being thus fixed in its repoſitory, his next care was to appoint the claſſes of prieſts and Levites to officiate before it, according to their ſeveral functions. He alſo choſe a number of ſingers and players upon muſical inſtruments, to celebrate the praiſes of God in their turns, to ſet ſuch pſalms and hymns as he, or any other inſpired perſon, compoſed, in order to have them ſung upon feſtivals and other ſolemn occaſions. The author of the Chronicles has preſerved us one of them in words at length, which he then compoſed as an euchariſtical canticle, and delivered to the muſicians, to be ſung upon the removal of the ark to his houſe [a]; which may be juſtly eſteemed one of the ſublimeſt pieces of poetry extant, whether for its elegancy, or for the ſtrain of piety and gratitude that runs through the whole.

SOON after this, he ſent for the prophet Nathan, to conſult with him about the building of a temple to the Lord, telling him, that he could not, with any eaſe, dwell in a ſumptuous palace, whilſt the ark was only under a tabernacle. Piety. The prophet applauded his pious deſign, not doubting but God would ratify and proſper it; but God who appeared to him that night, directed him to go to the king, and the Chronicles *, that they repeated the ſame ſacrifices when they came near David's houſe, in thankfulneſs that God had helped the Levites to bring the ark to the place appointed for it, without any accident.

[z] 2 Sam. vi. [a] 1 Chron. xvi. paſſ.

It may be wondered at, that David choſe to erect a new tabernacle for the ark, inſtead of ſending for that which Moſes had cauſed to be made in the wilderneſs. It may be ſuppoſed indeed that the precincture of his palace was not capacious enough for it; but whatever the reaſon be, it is certain, that it continued ſtill, with the altar and all its other ſacred utenſils, at Gibeon, till Solomon having built his temple, cauſed them to be brought and depoſited in it, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place.

* 1 Chron. xv. 26.

to

to tell him, that though his intentions were highly acceptable to him, yet, foraſmuch as he had ſo often defiled his hands with blood, he did not think him a proper perſon for ſuch a work, but that he would raiſe him up a ſon and ſucceſſor (Z), whoſe reign he would bleſs with a profound peace, with extraordinary wiſdom, affluence, and proſperity, and that he ſhould build him a temple. He added, that it was upon him that he would ſettle the throne of Iſrael unto the end, and proſper *him and his ſucceſſors in proportion to their obe*dience to him; and that even the moſt ſtubborn diſobedience ſhould not bring upon them a total dereliction, but only ſuch fatherly chaſtiſements as might bring them to a filial repentance. David, full of the ſenſe of all theſe gracious promiſes, went and proſtrated himſelf before the Lord, and in the humbleſt and moſt pathetic terms, acknowledged his extreme unworthineſs of all theſe promiſed mercies, and his reliance on his omnipotent goodneſs for the fulfilling of them in his own good time [b].

FROM that time, he applied part of his care in making preparations for that ſumptuous building, and in laying up for it immenſe quantities of gold, ſilver, copper, precious ſtones, woods, and other materials. For in thoſe ſucceſsful wars which he had againſt the Philiſtines [c], Moabites [d], Amalekites [e], the kings of Zobah, Syria [f], and Edom [g], of which the beſt account has been given in their ſeveral hiſtories that could be got out of the ſacred records, he got ſuch a prodigious quantity of the richeſt ſpoil, part of which he

[b] 2 Sam. vii. paſſ. 1 Chron. xvii. paſſ. & alib. [c] See Vol. II. p. 227. [d] Ibid. p. 92. [e] Ibid. p. 155. [f] Ibid. 273. [g] Ibid. p. 142. See 2 Sam. viii. paſſ.

(Z) From the words in the text, the ſeed, or ſon that ſhall proceed out of thy bowels (24), the Jews infer, that the crown could devolve neither to Amnon, Abſalom, Adonijah, nor to any of thoſe ſons that were born before this promiſe (25); but as the future is often uſed for the perfect tenſe, according to the genius of the original, the argument is no way concluſive, unleſs we throw into the ſcale the objection which is urged againſt the father, being equally ſtrong againſt thoſe ſons, who, being all warriors, had no doubt, imbrued their hands in blood; from which Solomon was to be altogether free. This exception is not indeed mentioned in the book of Kings, but we find it urged in the book of Chronicles, as an argument why God did not think David pure enough to erect ſo ſacred an edifice to him (26).

(24) 2 Sam. vii. 12. (25) Vid. Munſt. Jun. & al. in loc. (26) 1 Chr. xxii. 8. xxviii. 3.

never failed to dedicate to this design, that the wealth which he left his son at his death is almost beyond belief. His œconomy was not inferior to his success; he found that the keeping of a numerous army would either exhaust his treasury too much, or cause too great a share of his subjects lands to lie uncultivated; to prevent which he appointed twelve bands, each of 24,000 men, with proper officers over them, to serve each their respective month in the year; after which they were dismissed to their own private affairs during the other eleven months. He likewise appointed twelve expert persons over his finances (A), under Azmaveth and Adoram; and judges in every tribe, to administer justice to the people; besides those of his great council, who had the affairs of religion and state under their care; the former under the two high-priests, Zadok the son of Abitub, and Abimelech the son of Abiathar (B); and the latter under proper officers, among which Joab was general of the army; Jehoshaphat was chief secretary, Serajah recorder, Benaiah over the Che-

(A) These are supposed to have been of two kinds; either such as were exacted from his subjects, or those that accrued from his own hereditary lands or conquered dominions. Each kind of tribute, whether paid in money, grain, or other produce, were collected by their particular officers (27).

(B) We have already taken notice, that these two were, the one, namely Zadok, of the eldest, and Abimelech of the youngest branch of Aaron's family, and that the high-priesthood had shifted from the one to the other †; but that one of each branch should exercise that function at the same time, is what is not to be met with either before or since. It is probable, that Saul after he had killed all the priests in Nob, except Abiathar who fled to David, might set up Zadok to officiate in that dignity in Israel, as Eleazar did in Judah, and that when David came to be king of all the twelve tribes, he did not think fit to deprive either of their office, but suffered them both to continue in it; but whether alternately, or subordinately, whether the one at Gibeon, where the tabernacle stood, and the other at Jerusalem, where the ark was; or lastly, whether the one in the tribe of Judah, and the other over the other tribes, we will not venture to determine. Certain it is, that they are still mentioned together upon several other occasions (28) till the beginning of Solomon's reign, when Zadok's competitor was divested of his dignity, for having gone over to the party of Adonijah (29).

(27) Ibid. xxvii. 25, & seq. 2 Sam. xx. 24, & seq. † See before p. 234 not. S. (28) Vid. int. al. 2 Sam. xv. 29, & 35. xix. 11, & 12, & alib. (29) 1 King. i. 7, 8. ii. 35, & alib.

rathites

rethites and Pelethites (C); whilſt ſome of the king's ſons were ſet over all theſe officers [h] (D).

But

[h] See 1 Chron, xxvii. paſſ.

(C) It is not eaſy to gueſs who theſe were. The Chaldee paraphraſt renders theſe words by archers and ſlingers; and the Rabbies underſtand by them, abſurdly enough, ſome the Urim and Thummim, and others the grand Sanhedrin, deriving the firſt word from כרת Careth, to break ſhort, as if they had been כורתים דבריהם men that broke their ſentences ſhort, or ſpoke ſuccinctly and with authority, and the other from פלא Phele, wonderful (30); and if we have no better helps, we may remain in the dark long enough. But we have already obſerved elſewhere, that the Cherethites were Philiſtines *, and we ſhall now give ſome further proofs of it.

When the Amalekites had burnt Ziklag, and David in purſuit of them, met with an Egyptian, that youth informed him, that they had made an incurſion into the ſouth of the Cherethites and ſo on (31); from which it is plain, that they muſt have been either Philiſtines, or ſome people that dwelt among them, as the Geſhurites did; unleſs we will ſuppoſe with Tremellius, that they were a colony of Iſraelites that took poſſeſſion of that country, after the Philiſtines had been driven out of it, which we ſee no grounds for admitting. For we find the prophet Ezekiel joining the Cherethites and Philiſtines together, either as ſynonymous, or at leaſt cohabiters, in theſe words, Behold I will ſtretch out mine hand upon the Philiſtines, and I will cut off the Cherethims, and deſtroy the remnant of the ſea-coaſt (32). Another prophet expreſſes himſelf much after the ſame manner, Wo unto the inhabitants of the ſea-coaſts, the nation of the Cherethites, the word of the Lord is againſt you, O Canaan the land of the Philiſtines (33). Thus far concerning the Cherethites.

As for the Pelethites, we meet with nothing concerning them, except their being joined with them in this place, and in ſome chapters after, where they are both mentioned as accompanying David when he fled from his ſon Abſalom (34). But whether theſe two people were captives of war, auxiliary troops, or a kind of life-guard, we will not venture to determine.

(D) The text ſays here, that they were כהנים Cohanim, which properly ſignifies Prieſts, but which our verſion doth rightly render, Chief Rulers and Princes, in the margin, according to a parallel text in the Chronicles, where they are ſaid to have been הראשונים ליד המלך The chief about the king And it is plain, that in ſeveral other places, particularly thoſe quoted in the (30) Vid. Munſt. in loc. * See Vol. II. p. 200. not. I. (31) 1 Sam. xxx. 14. (32) Ch. xxv. 16. (33) Zephan. ii. 5. (34) 2 Sam. xv. 18.

Gratitude to Jonathan's son.

But neither the cares of ſtate, nor his uncommon proſperity, could make him forget his affectionate engagements to his late generous friend Jonathan. He ſought out his only ſon Mephiboſheth, who was lame of his feet, and under the care of one of Saul's ſervants named Ziba; he ſent for him to court, and after he had ſhewed him all poſſible tokens of friendſhip and tenderneſs, he cauſed all the lands of his royal grandfather to be reſtored to him, commanding Ziba to improve them to the beſt advantage for his maſter, and appointed him a table in his own palace, and among his own ſons; which he enjoyed to the day of his death [1].

HIS gratitude to the king of the Ammonites did not meet with the ſame returns: Nahaſh, from whom David had received ſome ſignal favours, being dead, he ſent a congratulatory embaſſy to his ſon, with offers of mutual friendſhip; but that weak prince, unjuſtly ſuſpecting the ambaſſadors were come upon ſome baſer deſign, treated them in a ſhameful manner and ſent them away. This affront however turned to David's advantage; Joab was ſent to revenge it at the head of a powerful army, and that victorious general gained a complete victory againſt the Ammonites and their confederates, and returned to Jeruſalem. The Syrians, however, one of thoſe confederates, came again the next year with a freſh army: Shobach, general of Hadadezer, or Hadarezer, king of Syria Zobea, who was at their head, came and encamped at Helam; but David made ſuch ſpeed over Jordan with a powerful army, and gave him ſuch an overthrow, that they were glad to clap up a peace with him, and to become his tributaries. The Ammonites were likewiſe ſo weakened by theſe defeats, that they would have been glad to have remained quiet; but David was too exaſperated and too ſucceſsful againſt them, not to purſue his victory to the utmoſt, margin (35), the word is generally taken in that ſenſe. Several learned Jews indeed, to extol the piety of David, underſtand by Coben here the diſciples of the prieſts, from which they would infer, that that pious monarch cauſed his ſons to be educated under them (36). If that were true, it is certain that ſome of them did not much credit their maſters; but the text ſays nothing of it: on the contrary, the author of the firſt book of the Chronicles tells us, that Jonathan, David's uncle, a perſon of conſummate wiſdom, was the perſon who was intruſted with that important buſineſs (37).

[1] 2 Sam. ix. paſſ.

(35) Gen. xli 45. xlvii. 22. Exod. ii. 16. iii. 1. Job xii. 19, & alib. (36) Vid. Munſt. in loc. (37) Ch. xxvii. 32.

by

by ſending Joab to invade their country, which that general did with that valour and ſeverity, as reduced them to the loweſt ebb †.

WHILST Joab was taken up with the ſiege of the metropolis of the unfortunate children of Ammon, a place of ſuch ſtrength that it held out two years againſt him, David, wholly relying on his valour and conduct, was ſolacing himſelf at home, and became unfortunately enamoured with a beautiful woman, whom he had, from his terrace, obſerved waſhing herſelf one evening in her garden. Upon enquiring who ſhe was, he was informed that ſhe was the daughter and wife of two of his braveſt captains, Eliam and Uriah (E), who were then with Joab at the ſiege; but his paſſion proved too violent to admit of any check from reaſon or religion, or even of a delay. The fruit of their unlawful commerce was her ſudden pregnancy, and the danger ſhe was in of being put to death for it, according to the law of Moſes. The king bethought himſelf of an expedient to prevent the latter, by ſending for her huſband from the ſiege, under pretence indeed of informing himſelf how it was carried on, but in reality, in hopes of his ſpending a night or two with her; but whether Uriah had any ſuſpicion of the wrong done to him, or whether indeed he thought it beneath the bravery of a captain to go and ſolace himſelf at home, whilſt his general and fellow-ſoldiers were expoſed to the fatigues of a ſiege; he made this laſt his excuſe for not going home to his wife, and contented himſelf with lying at the gate of the palace, with the reſt of the king's guard. The king thus diſappointed, reſolved to try him a ſecond time; he made him eat at his table, and at ſupper plied him ſo well with wine, that he

Year of the Flood, 1964. Year before Chriſt 1035.

His adultery,

† 2 Sam. x. paſſ. See Vol. II. p. 104, & ſeq.

(E) At leaſt we find one Eliam in the number of David's worthies, who was the ſon of Ahithophel (38), and is ſuppoſed to have been her father, and that the affront offered to her cauſed that great politician to join in the conſpiracy of Abſalom. As for her huſband, he is ſurnamed the Hittite, probably becauſe he was of that nation, and a proſelyte to the Jewiſh religion, though ſome will have it, that he is ſo called, only becauſe he was either born or had dwelt amongſt them, or upon ſome warlike exploit he had atchieved againſt them (39). Joſephus neither mentions this as a ſurname, or as that of his nation, but only ſays, that he was Joab's armour-bearer (40).

(38) 2 Sam. xxiii. 34. (39) Vid. Berruyer. Munſt. Jun. & al. (40) Ant. l 7. c. 7.

did

did not doubt but he would, in that merry humour, have gone home to his wife; but Uriah, drunk as he was, ſpent that night alſo with the guards; and the king, who by this time could not but ſuſpect that he had ſome more private reaſon for abſenting himſelf from home, reſolved to ſacrifice his life to that of his faithleſs wife. Accordingly, on the next morning he diſpatched him with a letter to Joab, wherein he ordered that general, who was the fitteſt perſon for ſuch a bloody deed, to expoſe that brave officer to ſome imminent danger, and to leave him to the fury of the beſieged. This was accordingly done; and David having received the news of his death, ſent and acquainted Bath-ſheba with it, who put herſelf in mourning for him, and was ſoon after ſheltered from danger by being married to the king [k]. We have ſeen elſewhere the ſucceſs of this long ſiege, and the hard fate of the conquered Ammonites *: all we need to add here is, that what is ſaid there of their monarch's crown, that it weighed a talent of gold, that is upwards of 113 pounds, is rather to be underſtood of its worth than its weight, that is, that the gold and precious ſtones, with which it was adorned, were equal in worth to a talent of gold (F) [l].

And murder.

IN the interim, God, highly provoked with David for two ſuch heinous crimes, made choice of the prophet Nathan to go and denounce his ſevere judgments againſt him, at the time when that monarch, inſenſible of his guilt, was hugging in his arms the fruit of his adultery. The prophet who knew his generous and upright heart, in any caſe wherein this new and criminal paſſion was not concerned, accoſted him with a parable of a wealthy man, who had ſpared his own numerous flocks, and ſeized upon an only favourite [k] 2 Sam. xi. paſſ. * See Vol. II. p. 107. [l] 2 Sam. xii. 30.

(F) It were indeed abſurd to underſtand it otherwiſe, for what man could bear ſuch a weight, though we ſhould even underſtand it of the common talent of 60 pounds, as Kimchi doth. Some Jews and others do indeed fancy, that it was only hung over the monarch's head, like the top of a canopy (41); but this is contrary to the plain meaning of the original, which did not want words to have expreſt that circumſtance, had it been fact. But we ſhall have further occaſion to ſhew, that the word משקל Miſhkal, doth often ſignify the value, though properly and generally the weight, of a thing (42).

(41) Vid. Munſt. in loc. (42) Vid. Bochart. Hieroz. p. 1. & Le Scene Eſſay on a new verſ. pt. 2. Ch. ii. § 6.

lamb

lamb of a poor neighbour, to feaſt an hungry gueſt. He dreſt his ſtory with ſuch aggravating circumſtances, that the king in anger pronounced ſentence of death againſt the perſon who had been guilty of ſuch an unnatural violence. The words were no ſooner out of his mouth, than Nathan made him ſenſible, that he had pronounced it againſt himſelf, by telling him, with a prophetic boldneſs, that he was the guilty perſon, and much more guilty than that in the parable, in that he had not only defiled the bed of a faithful captain, but had murdered him by an enemy's ſword, that he might take the adultereſs into his boſom. He then recapitulated to him all the aggravations of his double crime; particularly his ingratitude to his divine protector and benefactor, and the occaſion he had given to his enemies to blaſpheme (G). He concluded with denouncing the effects of the divine reſentment againſt him, that Uriah's murder would prove an endleſs ſource of bloodſhed in his own poſterity, and that his adultery, how private ſoever, ſhould be expiated by the open defilement of his own wives and concubines, by thoſe of his own family, and in the face of the ſun. His puniſhment.

THIS terrible ſentence brought David to ſuch a deep ſenſe of his guilt, that his heart, too full of it, could only ſay, I have ſinned againſt the Lord; but the ſincere remorſe with which it was uttered, obtained an immediate alleviation of the puniſhment. However, the unhappy ſon of Bathſheba was doomed to death, and David tried in vain to obtain a reprieve for him by prayers, and tears, by faſting, ſack-cloth, lying on the ground, and other marks of repen-

(G) This expreſſion of the prophet inclines us to think, that David had not been able ſo to conceal his crime, but that it had taken wind among the neighbouring nations, who could not forbear reflecting upon the God of Iſrael, for favouring a monarch who could be guilty of ſuch horrid crimes, as themſelves perhaps were ſtrangers to.

David however was ſo ſenſibly touched with his guilt, that he ceaſed not compoſing pſalms, full of the ſtrongeſt expreſſions of humility and repentance. Some of them ſeem even to intimate, that God had ſmitten him with ſome very grievous and painful diſeaſe, as a puniſhment for his ſin (43); but it is poſſible, that they may be altogether allegorical, and ſignificative only of his exceſſive grief and remorſe for it. Among his other penitential compoſitions, the 51ſt is ſuppoſed to have been writ immediately after Nathan's ſevere reproof.

(43) Vid. int. al. Pſ vi. xxxviii. paſſ. lxxvii. 2, & ſeq. lxxxviii. paſſ. cii 3, & ſeq. & alib. paſſ.

tance.

tance. As for the other part of the sentence, which related to his wives, it was soon after fulfilled by his unnatural son Absalom, as we shall see anon. The child being dead, according to the saying of the prophet, David comforted his new wife for the loss of it, soon after which she found herself pregnant, and he called the son that she then bore to him Solomon, a name significative of his future peaceful reign, to which Nathan added that of Jedidiah, or beloved of the Lord [m], such as he proved indeed, at least during the former part of his glorious and successful reign.

BUT it proved far otherwise with the remainder of that of his father, who, what hopes soever he might have conceived, from the birth and promised glory of this new son, and from his victory over the Ammonites, that his repentance had happily disarmed the divine anger, never ceased feeling some of the severest and most sensible strokes of it, to the last period of his life: not indeed from his enemies without, from whom it doth not appear that he received the least molestation, but from those of his own family, even from his own children. Amnon, his eldest son, was scarcely eighteen years of age, when he layed the foundation of all the domestic troubles of his too indulgent father, by an unnatural incest with one of his own sisters. David had had two children by Maacah, the princess of Geshur, Absalom and Tamar [n], whose beauty became the unhappy cause of this unlawful passion. Amnon was observed to pine away secretly, ashamed to discover the cause of his trouble, when a near relation, Jonadab, the son of Shimeah, David's brother, having pumped the fatal secret out, not only encouraged him, but furnished him with means to perpetrate the deed. According to his hellish advice, Amnon, pretending that his disease had now confined him to his bed, obtained an order from his father, that Tamar should come to him, and make him some kind of confectionary meat, to please his palled appetite; which that innocent princess readily complied with. But she was scarcely entered with it into his bed-chamber, before he, having previously sent all his attendants far enough, laid hold on her, and, in spite of all her prayers and remonstrances, ravished her. His lust thus satisfied, he conceived such a disgust against her, that, not being able to bear her presence any longer, and finding a just and modest reluctancy in her to withdraw in that deplorable condition, his barbarity rose to such a height, that he violently caused her to be turned out of his houſe by ſome of his ſervants. Her grief and confuſion were now become too great to ſuffer her to think how to avoid expoſing herſelf; ſo that, forgetting every thing but her preſent misfortunes, ſhe only ſought how to expreſs her ſenſe of it by the moſt lively tokens; by tearing her virgin robes, covering her head with duſt, by walking with her arms over her head, and filling the air with her cries. In this manner ſhe went to Abſalom's houſe, who being her brother, both by father and mother, was the propereſt perſon to procure her a redreſs, if any could be had. That prince, who was naturally haughty and revengeful, could not but feel the deepeſt reſentment againſt ſo barbarous a violence; however, as the revenge he meditated againſt the raviſher was of too deep a nature to be preſently executed, he contented himſelf with deſiring his diſconſolate ſiſter to alleviate, or at leaſt to conceal, her grief, ſeeing it was a brother who was the cauſe of it, and to ſpend the remainder of her days in ſolitude with him; which ſhe did accordingly; whilſt he, young as he was, did ſo well conceal his reſentment, that Amnon had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of it. When the news of this villainous action came to David's ears, he was exceedingly troubled at it, but that was all; Amnon was his eldeſt ſon, and he could not prevail upon himſelf to inflict any other puniſhment on him, than that of his diſpleaſure.

Amnon's incest.

[m] 2 Sam. xii. 25. [n] Ibid. Chap. iii. 3.

THIS remiſſneſs did but add fewel to Abſalom's hatred, though he did not find a proper opportunity for his deſign till two years after; by which time Amnon's crime might be ſuppoſed to be forgot. The better to conceal his revenge, he invited his father and all his brothers to a ſheep-ſhearing feaſt, which he was to make at Baal-hazor. He eaſily excuſed the king, who declined going, from a principle of oeconomy, becauſe he had only invited him out of formality, and to avoid ſuſpicion; but he inſiſted, in particular, upon his brother Amnon's favouring him with his preſence with the reſt of his brethren, and eaſily obtained his conſent. When they were come to the place, he received them with an air, which ſhewed nothing leſs than his murdering intention; but as ſoon as he obſerved that wine had raiſed their mirth to the deſired pitch, he gave a ſignal to a number of his ſervants, whom he had appointed for the deed, and who immediately fell upon Amnon and ſtabbed him to death; whilſt the reſt of the king's ſons expecting, perhaps, their turns would be next, made all poſſible haſte to get to their mules, and rode away to Jeruſalem. But before they could reach it, word had been brought to the king, that Amnon murdered by Abſalom.

Abſalom had cauſed all his brethren to be aſſaſſinated. One may eaſily imagine how he received the dreadful news; he rent his cloaths, caſt himſelf down upon the ground, and abandoned himſelf to the moſt violent expreſſions of grief. The ſervants that were about him endeavoured to bear a part in this tragic ſcene, and ſtood round him with their cloaths rent. Jonadab only, the infamous inſtrument of Amnon's inceſt, did rightly gueſs, that he alone had proved the victim of Abſalom's revenge. He acquainted the king with his thoughts, which were ſoon after confirmed by the arrival of the reſt of the young princes, who, with tears in their eyes, told him all that had happened. It was a melancholy meeting on all hands; the king mourned for ſome time the loſs of his eldeſt ſon, whilſt his murderer, not expecting the ſame remiſſneſs from him, went and ſheltered himſelf under the protection of his grandfather, the king of Geſhur, where he continued three whole years [o].

By that time, Joab, obſerving that the king expreſſed leſs grief for his dead ſon, than uneaſineſs for his abſent one, did reaſonably conclude, that if he could work upon him to recal him by any ſtratagem that could but ſave his honour, it would be an acceptable ſervice to them both. To compaſs this, he inſtructed a notable woman, whom he had ſent for from Tekoah, a place not far from Jeruſalem, to addreſs herſelf to the king under the perſonage of a diſtreſſed widow, juſt on the brink of being bereaved of the only ſon ſhe had left, who was in danger of being put to death for having killed his brother in a fray, by which there would be a final end of her huſband's name and family. The ſtory bore indeed no parallel with that of Abſalom; perhaps the politic Joab had contrived it ſo, to prevent the king's ſuſpecting it to be a deſigned thing. However, ſhe told it with ſuch pathetic expreſſions of grief, that David, moved with compaſſion, gave her his royal word, that her ſurviving ſon ſhould be ſheltered from all future proſecution. He had ſcarce bound it with an oath, when, according to her inſtruction, ſhe took the liberty, though in the humbleſt terms, to repreſent to him the wrong he did himſelf, by ſuffering his ſon to continue longer in his baniſhment, ſeeing that could by no means recal the dead, whoſe life once gone was like water ſpilt upon the ground, which could not be gathered up again. The king, who by this time perceived the woman's drift, failed not to conclude, that Joab was at the bottom of it; he taſted the woman with it, and ſhe, in the modeſteſt terms, acknowledged it, adding, that the king was as an angel of God, from whom it was impoſſible to conceal any thing. Joab, who was preſent all this while, took this opportunity of falling proſtrate before him, ſeemingly to beg pardon for his ſtratagem, but really to lay hold on his promiſe in favour of Abſalom; and David, as willing to grant as he was to aſk, did immediately order him to fetch him from his baniſhment, but with this condition, that he ſhould not approach the king's perſon, but retire to his own houſe; which was complied with accordingly, for he did not ſee the king for two whole years after his return (H). But being tired at length with living ſo long in diſgrace, and having ſent in vain for Joab, once and again, to come to him, he found no other way of bringing him, but cauſing ſome of his adjacent corn to be ſet on fire. Joab ſoon came

[o] 2. Sam. xiii. p. tot.

at

(H) The text doth here take notice of his exceſſive and ſnaring beauty, which did ſo captivate the hearts of the people to him, that it inſpired him with the firſt ſentiments of his unnatural rebellion.

One circumſtance it mentions, relating to the yearly polling of his hair, which, taken in a literal ſenſe, will appear incredible; it being ſaid to have amounted to 200 ſhekels after the king's weight, that is, at leaſt, to three pounds two ounces; but to double that weight, according to ſome, who make the king's ſhekel to have been equal to that of the ſanctuary, that is, to half an ounce avoirdupoize. Such a monſtrous quantity of hair, were any head able to bear the weight of it, would rather diſfigure, than be an ornament to it; we think it therefore more probable, that the word שקל Shakal, is here to be underſtood of the value, and not of the weight of it; that is, that it was worth 200 ſhekels, whether half or quarters of ounces of ſilver. Not that we will ſuppoſe that Abſalom ſold it, though even that is not impoſſible (44), but that, whether he gave it to his ſervants, as a perquiſite, or to ſome favourite women, it was reckoned worth that ſum. Some Jewiſh doctors do tell us, that his hair being exceeding long and fair, was in great requeſt among the great women in Jeruſalem, to adorn their heads with (45)

There is another difficulty in this place (46), where mention is made of Abſalom's three ſons, and of one daughter, named Tamar; whereas it is ſaid, in another place (47), that he reared up a pillar in the king's dale, to perpetuate his name, becauſe he had no male iſſue. All that can be ſuppoſed is, that they died in that ſhort interval, though no mention is made of their death.

(44) Vid. Le Scene. Eſſ. on a new verſ. pt. ii. ch. 2. § 7.
(45) Id. Ibid. (46) 2 Sam. xiv. 27. (47) Ibid. ch. xviii. 18.

Absalom reconciled to his father.

to him at the news of this unexpected treatment; and, after some passionate expostulations on both sides, it was agreed, that the king should be applied to in favour of his son, which was soon after successfully done by that general [P].

THIS reconciliation could not but convince Absalom of his father's weak fondness for him; but that ungrateful prince sought only how to make the most unnatural advantage of it. He immediately procured a sumptuous equipage of chariots, horses, and running-footmen, to attract the eyes of the people; and, by an affected popularity, and seeming compassion for those who came to the king for justice, and the difficulty of obtaining it from him, it was not long before he gained also their hearts, and persuaded them, that they would be much happier under his government. This he continued doing some years (I), after which, finding himself strong enough to break out into an open rebellion, and being perhaps afraid, lest his artifices should at length give the king some suspicion of his perfidious design, he obtained leave of his too easy father to go and perform a pretended vow in Hebron, where he had appointed the chief of his party to meet him; whilst others, who were dispersed through the tribes, were ordered to proclaim him king, as soon as they heard the signal given by the sound of the trumpet. He took among others 200 men from Jerusalem, who, being altogether ignorant of his design, served only to conceal it the more. At his coming to Hebron, he sent for Ahithophel (K) from Giloh, his native place; and the defection of that great

And rebels against him.

Year of the Flood, 1976. Year before Christ, 1023.

[P] Ch. xiv. p. tot.

(I) The text says forty years (48), but the learned Usher has shewed, that it can be only meant from David's being first anointed by Samuel, and not from his reconciliation to Absalom; for this rebellion happened about four years after it (49). That prelate observes, that it was before or about Whitsuntide, by the new fruits and parched corn, which Barzillai brought to David in his flight (50).

We may likewise observe here, that Absalom is the first who introduced the use of horses in Israel; till then the kings used to ride on mules, and the greatest nobles upon asses, as we have seen in the history of the judges.

(K) We have taken notice, in a late note, of the supposed reason of his defection, namely, his near relation to Bath-sheba, and great politician, who had been one of David's chief counſellors, did not contribute a little to increaſe the number of conſpirators. David was then at Jeruſalem, when news was brought to him of his ſon's rebellion; and being afraid of being ſurpriſed in it, and of being the cauſe, perhaps, of its inhabitants being put to the ſword, he left his palace to the care of ten of his concubines, and made what haſte he could out of the city. As ſoon as he came to the next convenient place, he made a halt, to take a melancholy view of the handful of men which followed him, and having obſerved the Cherethites and Pelethites to be of that number, whom we before obſerved to have been ſtrangers; he addreſſed himſelf to Ittai, who was probably their commander, and told him, that he did not expect that they, who were ſo lately come into his ſervice, ſhould ſhare in his adverſe fortune, and adviſed him to return home with his men, ſince it was not in his power now to reward their fidelity. But that brave officer anſwered him with an oath, that he would never forſake him, whatever might be the ſucceſs of his affairs, as long as he was able to draw a ſword in his defence. The king who could not but admire ſo faithful a zeal in a ſtranger, deſired him to paſs before him over the brook Kidron, whilſt the reſt of his followers, and the people that came to ſee this ſorrowful ſight, ſhed plenty of tears, to ſee the diſtreſs into which their monarch was driven by his unnatural ſon.

(48) 2 Sam. xvi. 7. (49) Ann. p. 37. (50) 2 Sam. xvii. 28.

his

AMONG thoſe that followed the king, were the high-prieſts, Zadok and Abiathar, at the head of a number of Levites who had brought the ark of God with them. David however did not think fit that they ſhould follow him, but commanded them to bear the ark back to Jeruſalem, whence they might ſend him intelligence of all that paſſed there, by their two ſons Ahimaaz and Jonathan, and aſſiſt him with their counſel, as they were ſeers, that is, as they had the gift of prophecy; whilſt he went and concealed himſelf in ſome of the plains of the wilderneſs, reſolved to ſubmit to whatever God ſhould decree concerning him. As ſoon as the prieſts were departed, David received the melancholy news, that Ahithophel was gone over to his ſon; upon which, he prayed earneſtly to God, to confound whatever counſel that old ſtateſman ſhould give to the conſpirators; and went up ſoon after, he and his ſmall troop, his reſentment for the injury done to her by David, which he did not think ſufficiently recompenſed by his marrying her (51).

(51) Sub. note. E.

the

the aſcent of mount Olivet, accompanied by his wives and children, and ſome people that followed him from Jeruſalem. The march was mournful beyond expreſſion: the king, bathed in tears, went up with his head covered, and his feet bare (L), whilſt this ſorrowful retinue expreſt their deep concern for him, by the livelieſt expreſſions of real grief: When they were come to the top of it, and had offered up their prayers to God, providence ſent him an old friend named Huſhai, who came with his cloaths rent, and aſhes upon his head, reſolved to ſhare in his misfortunes. David, though ſatisfied of his fidelity, did not think fit however to take him into his retinue, but rather begged of him to join himſelf to that of his rebellious ſon, where he might do him much greater ſervice, by thwarting the counſels of Ahithophel, and by informing him, by means of the two high-prieſts, of every thing that was reſolved among the rebels. Huſhai readily accepted the office, and acquitted himſelf of it with ſuch faithful zeal that he proved one main inſtrument of their overthrow [q].

IN the mean time, whilſt the ſorrowful monarch was on his march, Ziba, the treacherous ſervant of Mephiboſheth, brought him ſome neceſſary refreſhments; and being aſked where his maſter was, told him, that he was then at Jeruſalem, where he expected to be ſhortly reſtored to the throne of Iſrael. An accident, that followed upon the heels of this falſe report, helped to convince David of Mephiboſheth's ingratitude. He was ſcarce come as far as Bahurim, a village not very far diſtant from that metropolis, when he was met by one of Saul's family, named Shimei, who had the boldneſs to throw vollies of ſtones at him, accompanied with the bittereſt curſes and imprecations for being the author of Saul's misfortunes, notwithſtanding David was, at that time, ſurrounded by his guards and all his friends. This unexpected indignity did ſo inrage ſome of his captains, that they offered to go and ſmite off his head; but David reſtrained them, by putting them in mind of his more unnatural ſon, who ſought a tender father's life, whilſt this Benjamite expreſt no more than a natural concern for Saul's houſe; adding, that if his curſes came from God, as he knew not but they did, patience and reſignation would more effectually avert them, than ſuch a bloody reſentment. However, the thoughts of

[q] 2 Sam. xv.

(L) This we have ſhewed elſewhere was a token of the deepeſt mourning, and in this guiſe they uſed to accompany their neareſt relations to the grave (52).

(52) See before p. 359.

his

his having a double enemy now to ſtrive againſt, and that Mephibosheth had cauſed a new revolt againſt him, touched him ſo to the quick, that he gave all his lands away to his faithleſs ſervant, which was all that the wretch ſought for by this falſe accuſation.

By this time, Abſalom and Ahithophel were come to Jeruſalem, that city not daring to make any reſiſtance to that hitherto ſucceſsful prince; and here it was, that Huſhai came to congratulate and offer his ſervices to him. Abſalom, who knew him to have been a very faithful friend to his father, expreſt ſome ſurpriſe at firſt at this unexpected change; but was anſwered by that politic gentleman, that he thought it high time to abandon the father's intereſt, when providence had ſo openly declared for the ſon, who was moreover invited to the crown by the univerſal acclamations of the people; ſo that he had now no more to do but to ſerve him with the ſame fidelity, that he had done his father. Such a ſoothing ſpeech could not but pleaſe the proud young prince, who admitted him into the number of his counſellors, without the leaſt ſuſpicion; and repoſed ſuch confidence in him, that he ſoon after preferred his advice to that of Ahithophel, and loſt thereby the faireſt opportunity of ſecuring the victory and his father's crown to himſelf. As ſoon as they were well ſettled in the king's palace, a council was called, in which Ahithophel adviſed the prince to rear up a pavilion on the top of the houſe, and to go and lie with his father's concubines in the face of the ſun. This, as we obſerved before, being eſteemed the greateſt indignity that could be offered to a crowned head, that helliſh politician told him, was the moſt effectual means to make his men fight deſperately for him, becauſe they would then look upon the breach as irreconcileable. It could not be expected, that Abſalom, who had already been guilty of fratricide and of rebellion againſt his own father, ſhould ſcruple to add adultery and inceſt to his other crimes: he readily complied with the advice, and thereby fulfilled one part of Nathan's prophecy againſt his adulterous father[r].

THE next thing which Ahithophel adviſed the rebellious prince was, that he might be ſent at the head of 12,000 choſen men, to fall upon David's little army, whilſt they were ſtill weary with their flight; aſſuring him, that as ſoon as the king was taken off, which himſelf engaged to do, all the people would gladly come over to him as one man, and a quick end be put to the war. This counſel was approved both by Abſalom and all the elders of Iſrael, but as it was given in Huſhai's abſence, the prince reſolved to have his advice upon it; Ahithophel's counſel rejected.

[r] 2 Sam. xvi.

it; and Hushai being informed of it, and wisely foreseeing, that, if it were followed, David must be inevitably lost, omitted nothing to dissuade him from it. He told the council, that David and his officers were men of too great valour and experience, to suffer themselves to be thus surprised: that for ought he knew, they had fortified themselves by that time in some caverns, or among the rocks, whence they would sally out, like a bear bereaved of her whelps, and fall upon them with such desperate fury, that it would be impossible for them to stand the shock: that if they should be unhappily beaten back in this first enterprize, the fame of David's valour would quickly spread, and magnify his victory to such a degree, as would inject an universal terror into all their army, and give the exasperated king the fairest opportunity of quashing the conspiracy. For these reasons, he said, he thought it dangerous to undertake any thing against him, till Absalom had wholly disheartened his men, by calling together all Israel from Dan to Beersheba, and pouring his troops so thick upon them, that neither means nor hopes might be left to escape. Thus, added he, if they be hid among the rocks, we shall easily hunt or starve them out, and if they be retired into some strong city, our army will be able to pull it and them with ropes into the next river, till there is neither man nor stone left to oppose us. This swollen and affected speech could hardly have failed being suspected, had not providence suffered both the young prince and the council to be blinded with it. Ahithophel was the only person who perceived the drift and consequence of it; so that, vexed at the heart to see Hushai's advice preferred to his own, and that David, by gaining so much time, would, in all probability, recover his kingdom, he ordered his ass to be saddled, and rode away with all speed to his house, where, having settled his family affairs in the best manner he could, he went and hanged himself (M).

He goes and hangs himself.

Hushai, in the mean time, failed not to inform the high-priest with what had past, and of the danger the king and his men would be in, if they did not go over Jordan that very night. They dispatched therefore a maid-servant to their sons, Ahimaaz and Jonathan, who lay concealed for that purpose at En Rogel, with orders, that they should go immediately and

(M) The text adds, that he was buried in the sepulchre of his ancestors; for the only difference which the Jews made between those that died a natural or a violent death was, that the latter whether they died by their own hands, or by that of justice, were not buried till some time after sun-set (53).

(53) Vid. Joseph de bell. jud. iii. c. 14. & before p. 363.

inform

inform David of it. However, the avenues of Jeruſalem were ſo narrowly watched, that they were diſcovered by a youth, who gave immediate notice of it to Abſalom. It was not long before they were cloſely purſued, and forced to hide themſelves at Bahurim, where a kind woman concealed them in a well, by ſpreading a cloath over it with ſome pounded corn, as if ſhe had been drying it in the ſun. The meſſengers, having loſt ſcent of them returned to Jeruſalem, whilſt the two young prieſts haſted to David's camp, where they informed him of all that had been tranſacted at Abſalom's court. David loſt no time, but croſſed the Jordan, with his little army, in the dead of the night, and on the next morning, when he came to Mahanaim, and took a review of them, he found that they were all ſafely got thither with him. As ſoon as the news of his arrival had reached that neighbourhood, ſeveral of his friends came thither to him, with a timely ſupply of proviſion for himſelf and his men, with tents, couches, and other neceſſary utenſils. Among theſe were Shobi, the ſon of Nahaſh, an Ammonite; Machir of Lodebar, with whom young Mephibosheth had been brought up [r]; and old Barzillai of Rogelim, a wealthy Gileadite (N). On the other hand, Abſalom, hearing that his father was removed to this place, came againſt him with an army, under the command of Amaſa, and encamped in the land of Gilead [t].

David, having refreſhed himſelf and his troops, and ſupplied the vacancy of thoſe officers who were gone over to Abſalom, divided his army into three bodies, under the command of Joab and his two brothers, reſolving to appear in perſon againſt his rebellious ſon; but the people ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, alledging, that his life was of too great a conſequence to be hazarded, at a time when his enemy would prefer his ſingle death before the defeat of his whole army. The king acquieſced to them, and ſtayed at Mahanaim with a ſmall reinforcement; and whilſt the reſt of his men marched out before him, under their reſpective officers, he failed not to give them a ſtrict charge to be very tender of Abſalom's life. A fierce battle was ſoon after fought in the foreſt of [r] See 2 Sam. ix. 4 [t] xvii..

(N) Theſe proviſions were wheat, barley, flour, parched corn, ſeveral ſorts of pulſe, honey, butter, cheeſe, with ſome ſmall cattle. There might be alſo ſeveral other ſorts, though not mentioned in the text, ſuch as bread, wine, dried raiſins, and figs, and ſome others which we read were brought to David, at other times, by Abigail and Ziba (54).

(54) 1 Sam. xxv. 18. 2 Sam. xvi. 1.

Ephraim, wherein the rebel army was discomfited with the loss of 20,000 men, who were killed on the spot, besides a great number of others, who perished in the wood and in their flight. Absalom himself mounted upon a mule, was forced to fly from a party of David's men towards the wood, where the bough of a thick oak having taken hold of his bushy hair, the mule, running with full speed, left him suspended between heaven and earth. Joab, being informed of this accident by a soldier, stayed only to reprove him for not having dispatched him, and went himself to the place, and ran three darts through his body; after which he caused the trumpet to sound a retreat, to prevent a further effusion of blood. Absalom's body was taken down, and flung into a large pit, and covered with a heap of stones; and the rest of the rebels were no sooner informed of his death, than they fled every man to his home. All this while the king stayed at the gate of Mahanaim, impatient to hear the success of the action; but in his heart more solicitous for the life of his unnatural son, than for that of his friends, or even for his own; insomuch, that when he received the news of his death, not able to suppress his tears, he was forced to withdraw himself to the chamber over the gate, to hide his extreme weakness, and give a full vent to his grief[u].

Absalom, hung by his hair, is killed by Joab.

THIS untimely sorrow of the king did so damp the joy of his whole army, that they retired into the city, more like cowardly runaways, than like victorious soldiers. Joab easily foresaw the consequence of it, and that it would cause a general defection; and, as he was naturally bold and haughty, he made no difficulty to go up, and upbraid him with his ingratitude to his faithful friends in such insolent terms, though covered with a shew of loyalty and concern, that the afflicted king was forced to suspend, or at least conceal, his grief, and shew himself to the people with a seeming chearful countenance. As soon as they heard of his appearing publicly at the gate of the city, not only his own men, but even those who had followed Absalom came in crowds, and strove who should shew the greatest affection to him. They remembered that he had often delivered them from the oppression of their enemies: Absalom was now dead, and David victorious; so that they had nothing now to do, but to regain his favour by a timely submission. As soon therefore as the king perceived that all the tribes were ready to bring him back to Jerusalem, he sent word to the two high-priests, to hasten the elders of Judah to come and accompany him back to his palace, and

David is acknowledged by all the tribes.

[u] xviii. p. tot.

to

to promiſe to Amaſa, Abſalom's general, that if he would come over to him, he ſhould be his chief general in the room of Joab (O). Among thoſe that came over Jordan to meet the king Shimei was one of the firſt; he came at the head of a thouſand men of his own tribe, and, falling proſtrate at his feet, acknowledged his crime, begged that it might be forgiven, in conſideration of his being foremoſt of all the tribes to congratulate him upon his late victory. David's generals did indeed think it a poor recompence for his late indignity to his prince, and were urgent to have him made an example to all Iſrael but the king willing to ſignalize, as it were, his new reign by an unparallelled clemency, did not only reprove their untimely zeal, but generouſly confirmed his pardon with an oath. Shimei forgiven.

Mephiboſheth came next, to expreſs his joy at the king's return, and to juſtify himſelf from the baſe aſperſions of his treacherous ſervant. He gave him indeed ſome evident proofs of his gratitude and fidelity, and of Ziba's perfidy, and the king ſeemed outwardly to be ſatisfied with them; but whether he was not really ſo, or that he cared not wholly to reverſe the grant he had made to the ſervant, he ordered the lands to be divided between his Maſter and him. Whilſt the king was getting ready to paſs over Jordan, his old friend Barzillai came to accompany him over that river, and to take his final leave of him. David would fain have perſuaded him to have gone with him to Jeruſalem, that he might have an opportunity of rewarding his ſervices; but the good old man excuſed himſelf from it on account of his old age, which had rendered him incapable of taſting the pleaſures of a court; deſiring him, that he would beſtow his favours on his ſon Chimham, who was ready to accompany him thither; which was readily granted.

(O) It appears by this that David had conceived an averſion for Joab; he had indeed done enough to deſerve it, by his inſupportable inſolence, by his treacherous murder of Abner, but more particularly for having dared to kill Abſalom, contrary to his expreſs orders, whom he ought to have brought alive to his father, and left it to him to have puniſhed his rebellion as he thought fit. On the other hand, Amaſa was a conſiderable perſon, the ſon of David's ſiſter (55), whom either the fear of the king's reſentment, or a deſire of keeping up his poſt of general, might eaſily induce to raiſe ſome new troubles in favour of Saul's houſe. Upon theſe accounts David thought it worth his while to bring him over to his intereſt by a generous pardon, and by giving him the command of his army, which would at the ſame time effectually ſuppreſs Joab's inſolence. But this laſt, who ſtuck at no baſe action to rid himſelf of a rival, did ſoon after break all the king's meaſures, by the murder of his new made general.

(55) Conf. Ch. xvii. 25, & xix. 13.

HITHERTO there had appeared nothing but an univerſal emulation between the tribes, to wipe off the guilt of their late defection, by the greateſt tokens of ſubmiſſion and zeal; but the partiality which David ſhewed for his own tribe, in inviting it to come foremoſt to receive him, raiſed ſuch jealouſy in the other ten, as ſeemed to threaten nothing leſs than a new revolt. The ten tribes, on the one hand, thinking themſelves injured, that that of Judah was preferred to them, in guarding the king homewards, complained in the bittereſt terms, that they had ſtolen him from them, with a deſign to deprive the reſt of their intereſt in him. Judah, on the other ſide, alledged that their near relation to him intitled them to that preference; which however they had made no other advantage of, than that of being neareſt to his perſon, without expecting any gratuity from him. To this the others anſwered, that David, as a king, being equally related to them all, their ſhare in him bore a ten-fold proportion to theirs, for which reaſon they ought to have been the firſt invited, and the neareſt to him [w]. The conteſt grew ſo fierce at laſt, through the obſtinacy of the tribe of Judah, that Sheba, a factious fellow of the tribe of Benjamin, took that opportunity to blow the trumpet, and to gather all the malecontents to him, who immediately diſclaimed all further intereſt in David, and bid open defiance to thoſe that adhered to him; upon which, he ſaw himſelf at the head of all the ten tribes, that only of Judah, which had occaſioned this defection, following their king from Jordan to Jeruſalem.

A new revolt againſt David.

As ſoon as David was come to his metropolis, he ordered his new general to ſet out, and gather what forces he could out of Judah, and to come to him within three days, whilſt himſelf took that time to clear his palace of his polluted concubines, and aſſign them a ſuitable maintenance and another houſe, where they might ſpend their days in a kind of widowhood. But Amaſa, who met with greater difficulty than he expected, having outſtayed his time, the king gave the command of his guards, and of thoſe few troops he had

[w] Ch. xix. 41, & ſeq.

about

about him, to Abiſhai, Joab's brother, another of his generals, who had commanded one third of his army againſt Abſalom, and ordered him to purſue Sheba before he could get into ſome fenced city. It is plain by this, that Joab was then in high diſgrace; however, he went along with Abiſhai, though not as a commander, and by that time they were come to the great ſtone of Gibeon, Amaſa joined them with his troops. Here the treacherous Joab came forth, ſeemingly to welcome him, and taking hold of his chin with one hand, as if he had intended to kiſs him, ran his ſword through his bowels with the other, and laid him dead at his feet. As ſoon as he had removed his body out of ſight, which he found did cauſe a general ſtop of his army, he marched with them directly to Abel of Beth-maachah, into which he heard the rebel had retired with ſome troops. He had ſcarce began to beſiege that place in form, when a prudent woman ſpake to him from the top of the wall, and deſired him to liſten to the advice of an inhabitreſs of a place, which he knew had been always famed for counſel and wiſdom [x], and to forbear his hoſtilities againſt a mother city of Iſrael; promiſing him, upon that condition, that the head of Sheba ſhould be flung to him over the wall. Joab conſented to the propoſal, and as ſoon as he had received the arch-rebel's head, he raiſed the ſiege and returned to Jeruſalem. This ſucceſsful action, which quaſhed, as it were, a dangerous revolt in the birth, and reſtored an univerſal peace to the kingdom, failed not to raiſe the credit of the diſgraced general among all the tribes, inſomuch that though he had undertaken it without order, yet the king ſaw himſelf forced to expreſs his approbation of it, by reſtoring him to his former poſt, which he enjoyed till that monarch's death [y].

Quelled by Joab.

Two years after this [z], began a famine in the land, which laſted three years; at the end of which, David conſulted the Lord concerning the cauſe of this heavy judgment, and the means of averting it. He was anſwered, that it was for the murder of the Gibeonites, whom Saul and his bloody houſe had unjuſtly cauſed to be ſlain (P); upon which he ſent to know

A famine in the land.

Year of the Flood, 1978.

Year before Chriſt 1021.

[x] xx. ver. 18. 19. [y] Ch. xx. [z] Ussher. Ann. ſub Ann. mund. 2983. & 2986.

(P) It is not eaſy to ſay when this ſlaughter of the Gibeonites was committed; the Jews do indeed pretend, that Saul had taken into his head, in one of his phrenetic fits of zeal, to cut them all know what satisfaction they required for the wrong, that they might afterward intercede for Israel, and remove that judgment from it. The Gibeonites sent him word, that they desired neither gold, silver, nor any valuable consideration, but only that seven males of Saul's family might be sent to be put to death by them, as a retaliation for Saul's cruelty. The king lost no time, but caused them to be sought out of that unfortunate house; but gave express orders, that Mephibosheth should be spared, out of friendship to his father. The unhappy victims of the Gibeonites resentment were two sons of one of Saul's concubines named Rizpah, who had been formerly debauched by Abner [a], and five sons of Michal, Saul's daughter (Q); and as soon as they were put to death, the famine was stayed. Whilst their carcasses were suffered to hang in the open air, which was almost a whole summer, Rizpah shewed so much concern for them, that she kept them night and day from being devoured by either fowls or wild beasts; which pious deed struck David with such remorse, that he caused them to be taken down, and buried with those of Saul and Jonathan in Zelah, the burying-place of the house of Kish. After this, David had four successive battles with the Philistines, which the reader may see in the history of that nation †; in the first of these he hazarded himself so far, that he was like to have been killed by one of their gigantic champions, but was timely succoured by one of his worthies; for which reason his officers swore, that he should never more off (56), but they give us no authority for it; so that the most received opinion is, that it happened when he slew all the priests and inhabitants of Nob; for the Gibeonites, as we have seen elsewhere †, were a kind of servants to them, employed in some of the lowest and most laborious offices.

off

[a] 2 Sam. iii. 7. † See Vol. II. p. 227.

(Q) Not that which had been given from David to Phaltiel, and was sent to him again by Ishboshath; for it is observed, that she was barren (57), but another of the same name, married to one Adriel of Meholah; or rather, as the Jews affirm, and with greater probability, Merab, Saul's eldest daughter (58), who had indeed been given to that very Adriel (59); so that it is supposed, that Michal is accidentally crept into the text, instead of Merab; though the Jews, unwilling to admit that, will have it, that Merab was their real mother, and Michal only by adoption (60).

(56) Vid. Munst. in loc. sub not. a. † See Vol. II. p. 176. (57) 2 Sam. vi. ver. ult. (58) Munst. ub. sup. (59) 1 Sam. xviii. 17, 19. (60) Chald. paraph. Rabbin. mult. & al.

expose

expoſe his perſon to ſuch dangers [b]. Theſe victories gave birth to a moſt excellent eucharistical poem, which that monarch compoſed in memory of his late deliverance, and is now the 18th pſalm [c].

David had not long enjoyed the fruit of his victories, before he brought a heavier puniſhment upon his kingdom, by taking it into his head to have the people numbered. Joab indeed, wicked as he was, did in vain repreſent to him the danger of his diſpleaſing God by it (R); the king would be obeyed; and he, with the reſt of the commiſſioners, were forced to ſet about it. Theſe travelled through the land on either ſide of Jordan, and, at the end of nine months and twenty days, brought him the ſum of all the fighting men in the whole kingdom; namely, of Iſrael 800,000, and of Judah 500,000 (S). But before this time, David, having ſome

David numbers the people.

[b] Ch. xxi. [c] Compare Ch. xxii. with Pſ. xviii.

(R) The text ſays, that the Iſraelites had provoked God's anger againſt them, (which is no great wonder, that being generally the returns they made to him, whenever they were bleſſed with any interval of peace and proſperity); and that he ſuffered David to be tempted to this deed; or, as the author of the Chronicles (61) words it, ſuffered Satan to tempt him to it. Not that the thing itſelf was forbidden; on the contrary, they had an expreſs permiſſion from Moſes for it, provided they paid half a ſhekel for every perſon ſo numbered (62). The reaſon therefore of God's being provoked with it was, in all probability, becauſe David did it from wrong motives, without any neceſſity, in time of profound peace, after ſo many miraculous deliverances, with a ſeeming confidence in his own ſtrength, and contrary to his continual profeſſions of truſting in God alone. As for that part of the puniſhment which fell ſo heavy upon ſo many thouſands of the people, it is ſuppoſed to have been owing to their neglect of paying the ranſom appointed by the Moſaic law (63).

(S) It appears by the book of Chronicles (64) that Joab, though in no other caſe ſcrupulous, went about this work with ſuch an unwilling mind, that he prolonged it as much as he could, in hopes the king would ſee his error, and put an end to it; which it ſeems he did; for Joab came back before he had numbered the tribes of Benjamin and Levi. The account which that general gave here doth likewiſe differ, in ſome particulars, from that of the Chronicles; from which we may probably gather, that Joab was not over exact

(61) 1 Chron. xxi. 1. (62) Vid. Exod xxx, 12, 13. (63) Ita. Rabbin. vid. Munſt. Nichol. & al. in loc. & in Exod xxx. (64) 1 Chron. xxi. 6.

ſome evident tokens of the divine diſpleaſure [d], was ſo far from receiving any ſatisfaction at the vaſt number of his ſubjects, that he was ſtruck with a lively ſenſe of his folly, which broke out in expreſſions of the deepeſt remorſe. On the next morning, the prophet Gad was ſent to him, to chooſe, as a puniſhment for his ſin, either a ſeven years famine (T), or to be three months purſued by his enemies, or a three days peſtilence. The humble monarch owned it to be a hard choice; but, conſidering that war and famine ſeldom fall ſo heavy on the great, as on thoſe of the lower rank, choſe the three days peſtilence, as the more equal puniſhment, and more immediately under the divine direction. No ſooner had David pronounced his choice, than that dreadful diſtemper received the divine commiſſion, and executed it with ſuch amazing ſwiftneſs, that it had deſtroyed 70,000 men before its time was expired. It had then begun to fall upon the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, when God was pleaſed to put a ſtop to it at David's prayer; who beholding the miniſter of divine vengeance (V) ſtanding by the threſhing-floor of Araunah, a prince of the Jebuſites which brings a peſtilence upon the land.

[d] See 1 Chron. xxvii. 24.

exact in his, and that it was afterwards rectified under the reign of Jotham (65). Others think the latter to be the leſs authentic of the two, and to have been corrupted rather than rectified; but it is better to ſay, that Joab not having finiſhed ſome of the tribes, becauſe he found that God was diſpleaſed at it (66), the reſt were afterwards added to it; which is the reaſon, that the number of Iſrael in the Chronicles doth ſo far exceed that in the book of Samuel; as for the difference in that of the tribe of Judah, the former may alſo be the moſt exact, and the latter only a round number.

(T) The book of Chronicles ſays three years famine (67), ſo that it is likely the prophet means here ſeven years, including the three years which were ſent upon the account of the Gibeonites; and and the next year, which could not be very fruitful through ſcarceneſs of ſeed, the Philiſtine war, and as Uſher conjectures (68), becauſe the fourth year being a jubilee, there was to be neither ſowing, nor reaping, but for the poor.

(V) The text ſays expreſly, that David ſaw the angel of the Lord that ſmote the people (69), and the book of Chronicles adds (70), that he ſaw him ſtanding between heaven and earth, with his ſword drawn, and that both he and the elders of Iſrael, who

(65) Conf. 2 Sam. xxiv. 9. 1 Chron. v. 17. xxi. 5, 6. & xxvii. 24. (66) Ibid (67) 1 Chro. xxi. ver. 12. Vid. Munſt. Jun. & al. in loc. (68) Ann ſub. A. M. 2987. (69) 2 Sam. xxiv. 17. (70) 1 Chron. xxi. 16.

Jebuſites (W), humbly entreated the Lord, that he would ſpare the innocent people, and let his anger fall upon himſelf and thoſe of his court, who bore a ſhare in his guilt. Whilſt he was offering up this mournful ſupplication, the prophet came to him, and commanded him to erect an altar on that ſpot of ground, where he had ſeen the deſtroying angel ſtand; and as David haſted towards the threſhing-floor, Araunah came forward to give him a reſpectful meeting; and as ſoon as he underſtood David's purpoſe of buying it of him, he made him a generous offer both of the floor, the threſhing-oxen, carts, and all the wooden inſtruments that were upon it. David thanked him for his offer, but told him, that it was not fit for the king of Iſrael to offer ſacrifices to God at other peoples coſt; and deſired him to ſet a price upon it. So Araunah ſold him the floor, and all that was upon it, for fifty ſhekels of ſilver (X). David haſted to rear an altar there upon the ſpot, and to offer burnt-offerings and peace-offerings upon it; and a miraculous fire, which deſcended from were with him, fell on their faces; and that Araunah and his ſons, who were threſhing there, did likewiſe ſee him, and went and hid themſelves (71); ſo that theſe two places compared together will by no means admit of an allegorical ſenſe.

(W) At leaſt he is generally believed to have been ſuch by Jews and Chriſtians, from the words (72), all theſe did Araunah the king give unto the king; for that is the true ſenſe of the original.

(X) The book of Chronicles ſeems again to claſh ſtrangely here with that of Samuel, in making the ſum, which David paid to the Jebuſitiſh prince, amount to 600 ſhekels of gold. Some rabbies have fancied, that every tribe paid fifty ſhekels, which made it amount to 600. But were that true, as it is not, becauſe David reſolved to be at all the charge himſelf, 600 ſhekels of ſilver would make but the 12th part of 600 ſhekels of gold, for that is the proportion theſe metals did bear to one another. Some learned men (73), obſerving that the words keſſeph and ſhekel did often ſignify money and value in general, think, that the firſt ſum was 60 ſhekels of gold, and the ſecond 600 ſhekels of ſilver, amounting in value to 60 ſhekels of gold; ſo that either ſum anſwers to 547 pounds Sterling (74). But we think that they remove the difficulty beſt, who ſuppoſe, that the 50 ſhekels of ſilver were paid only for the floor, oxen, and wooden inſtruments; and the 600 ſhekels of gold, for all the adjacent grounds, which were the place which David had choſen to build the temple upon (75).

(71) Ibid. ver. 20. (72) 2 Sam. xxiv. 23. (73) Villalpand. in Ezek. Bochart. Hieroz. tom. i lib. 1. c. 38. & al. (74) Vid. Le Scene Eſſay on a new verſ pt. ij. c. 2. (75) Munſt. Jun. Calm. & al. in loc.

heaven and consumed the victims, soon gave them a manifest proof, that God was again reconciled to the land [c].

BY this time David, who was about seventy years of age, had so exhausted his strength and natural heat, by a continual series of wars, fatigues, and misfortunes, that no cloaths could keep him warm; so that his servants were forced to seek him a young beautiful virgin to wait upon, and cherish him, and lie in his bosom. His declining state made Adonijah, who was now his eldest son, being next in birth to Absalom, begin to look upon himself as already invested with the regal dignity. He got a sumptuous equipage of chariots, guards, and running-footmen, whilst David, out of a natural fondness for his children, beheld it without shewing any dislike. It plainly appears, that young prince knew already that his father designed Solomon to be his successor; and it was to prevent it, that he made what haste he could to get himself proclaimed. To this end, he leagued himself with Joab and Abiathar, and with them invited all his brothers, Solomon excepted, with a considerable number of his father's officers, and of the elders of Judah, to a sumptuous feast, which he had prepared at Zoheleth, in order to be proclaimed king of Israel there.

Adonijah's conspiracy.

HIS design however was suspected by Nathan, Zadok, and some of David's worthies, who were in young Solomon's interest; the prophet therefore went and advised Bathsheba to go and inform the king of it, and to put him in mind of his promise in favour of her son. Whilst she was still speaking, Nathan came, as it had been preagreed, and gave the king an account of Adonijah's feast, company, and of the design of it: desiring to know, whether it was done with his consent. The king, surprised with this report, ordered immediately Solomon to be set on his mule, and to be carried to Gihon, accompanied with his guards, with Zadok, Benaiah, and some others of his chief officers, there to be anointed king; and then to be brought back, and seated upon the royal throne, and there proclaimed his successor by the sound of the trumpet.

Solomon proclaimed.

THE king's commands were executed with such speed, that Adonijah and his company had not the least knowledge of it, till they were alarmed with the universal shouts of the people, who cried, Long live king Solomon. Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, came soon after to them, and gave them an account of the whole ceremony, assuring them, that it was all performed by the king's express order, who had testified an uncommon joy, at seeing his favourite son seated upon his throne before he left the world, whilst the air was filled with the ac-

[c] 2 Sam. xxiv.

clamations

clamations of all the people. This unexpected news ſtruck them with ſuch amazement, that they all fled with the utmoſt ſpeed; and Adonijah, ſeeing himſelf forſaken, and expoſed to the reſentments of David and Soloman, went and took ſanctuary at the horns of the altar. Solomon, being informed of it, ſent him word, that if he behaved himſelf for the future like an honeſt man, he would not hurt a hair of his head; but aſſured him, that his next diſloyal attempt ſhould certainly be puniſhed with death. This meſſage brought Adonijah upon his knees to the new king; after which, he was ordered to retire to his own houſe [f].

David, now finding himſelf near his end, aſſembled the heads of all the tribes, his generals, and chief officers, with the prieſts and Levites, and acquainted them with his old deſign to have built a magnificent repoſitory for the ark of God, had not the prophet told him, that that work was reſerved for Solomon's peaceable reign. Notwithſtanding which, he told them, he had made great preparations for it, and laid up immenſe quantities of gold, ſilver, copper, iron, and other materials (Y); all which together with the plans and models of that

David's ſpeech to his officers.

[f] 1 King. i. paſſ.

(Y) The book of Chronicles ſays, that the gold, which was that of Ophir, amounted to 3000 talents; and the ſilver, which was of the pureſt ſort, to 7000 talents; as to the baſer metals, they are ſaid to have been without number (76).

Prideaux obſerves * two things concerning the immenſe quantity of gold, which David dedicated to the ſervice of the temple; the firſt is, that it was that of Ophir; from which he concludes, that he muſt have eſtabliſhed a navigation in his time, without which it cannot be conceived, how he could have heaped it up to that degree; for as for that which he got out of the ſpoils of war, and his public revenue, it makes an article by itſelf, excluſive of theſe 3000 talents.

His next obſervation we ſhall give in his own words, as they ſtand in the note under the former. "This ſum, ſays he, is ſo prodigi" ous, as gives reaſon to think, that the talents, whereby this ſum " is reckoned, were another ſort of talents, of a far leſs value than " the Moſaic talents, of which an account is given in the preface.
" For what is ſaid to be given by David [1 Chron. xxii. 14, 15, " 16, & xxix. 3, 4, 5.], and contributed by his princes [xxix. 6, 7, " 8.] toward the building of the temple at Jeruſalem, if valued by " theſe talents, exceeded the value of eight hundred millions of " our money, which was enough wherewith to have built all that " temple of ſolid ſilver."

(76) 1 Chron. cap ult. ver. 4. * Connect book I.

that edifice, the order and disposition of the several branches of the divine service, the courses of the priests and Levites, of the musicians, singers, and porters, the design for establishing judges and courts of justice, with many other religious, civil, and military regulations [g], he now resigned up to him, to be perfected and improved as his wisdom should direct him. He desired them to assist him in so desirable a work, and that those, who were desirous to contribute towards that building, should bring their free-will offerings into the treasury. He concluded with exhorting both his son and the rest of the assembly, to continue stedfast in the service of God, seeing that was the only condition upon which they must hope for happiness. This speech stirred up such a spirit of magnificence in the rich men of Israel, that they outvied one another in the richness of their presents towards the building of the temple; so that David had the pleasure to see an incredible quantity of gold, silver, copper, and other metals (Z), besides precious stones, marble, porphyry, and other rich materials, brought from all parts of the kingdom. The sight of so much wealth brought in with such readiness and alacrity, did as it were revive the monarch's poetic muse, and made him break out into an eucharistical rapture, full of the deepest gratitude to God, and good wishes for the prosperity both of his son and of his kingdom, which were seconded with a hearty and universal Amen, and accompanied with solemn sacrifices and other tokens of [g] 1 Chron. from ch. xxiii. to xxix. pass.

What seems to prove our author's last remark is, that those talents are only mentioned in the Chronicles, which were undoubtedly written after the return from the captivity. This appears, 1. From its mentioning of Cyrus's decree for rebuilding the temple; and, 2. From its carrying the genealogy beyond Zerubbabel, who was one of the chiefs that returned from Babylon; so that they might, by that time, be used to compute, either by Babylonish talents, which were somewhat above half the value of the Mosaic one, or perhaps by the Syrian, which is but a fifth of this. We need not to add, that the difficulty seems as great, with respect to the prodigious quantities of silver, brass, and iron, which, if computed by the large talent, amount to such an incredible sum, that one will be at a loss to guess how it could be disposed of in that building, and yet leave room enough for so much timber and stone.

(Z) These offerings are said to have amounted to 5000 talents, and upwards, of gold, 10,000 talents of silver, of brass 18,000 talents, and 100,000 talents of iron, besides precious stones, marble, wood, and other costly materials (77)

(77) 1 Chron. cap. ult. ver. 7.

joy.

joy. On the next day, the king ordered 1000 oxen, 1000 rams, and the ſame number of lambs, to be offered up, beſides the daily ſacrifices, and a proportionate quantity of meat and drink-offerings, with which the aſſembly was feaſted all that day, with a magnificence worthy ſo great and good a monarch [h]. In this aſſembly Solomon was anointed a ſecond time by Zadok, received the homage of all his brethren, and of all the chiefs of Judah and Iſrael, and was proclaimed king through all the tribes; Zadok was at the ſame time declared ſole high-prieſt, for his ſtrict adherence to Solomon [i], and Abiathar reduced to the ſecond rank, for his defection to Adonijah.

David's laſt inſtructions to Solomon.

AFTER this, the king ſent for his ſon to give him his laſt inſtructions; and firſt of all he put him in mind, that all the gracious promiſes, which God had made to him and his poſterity, were only conditional, and depended wholly upon their obedience to his laws, ſo that they muſt expect their proſperity to riſe and fall in proportion to their obedience. He then proceeded to recommend to him the family of the good old Barzillai, and thoſe other friends who had ſtuck to him in his adverſe fortune, and charged him to expreſs a grateful ſenſe of their friendſhip; as for Joab, added he, thou knoweſt how many vile actions he has been guilty of towards me, and how treacherouſly he has imbrued his hands in the blood of two brave generals, Abner and Amaſa, after I had taken them into my ſervice and friendſhip. I was not then in a condition to puniſh him for it; but I need not tell thee what to do, thou knoweſt but too well, that he has forfeited his life, and on how many accounts he is unworthy of it. Shimei doth not leſs deſerve a violent death, for his horrid curſes and indignity to me, when I laboured under the deepeſt affliction; but as he took an opportunity to acknowledge his crime, at a time when I thought it more proper to forgive than to puniſh it, I ſealed then his pardon with an oath; but thou, who art not under the ſame obligation, mayeſt, if thou thinkeſt fit, inflict ſuch a puniſhment as his crime deſerves. The king died ſoon after, in the ſeventieth year of his age, after having reigned ſeven years in Hebron over the houſe of Judah, and thirty three over all the twelve tribes. He left an immenſe treaſure behind him, beſides that which he had dedicated to the ſervice of the temple; and was buried in a ſtately tomb (A), in that part of the city which he had cauſed

His vaſt riches and burial.

to

[h] Ch. xxix. paſſ. [i] 1 Kings ii. 1, & ſeq. 1 Chron. xxix.

(A) we have had occaſion to ſpeak heretofore of this ſtately tomb, and of the immenſe treaſure that had been laid up in it by him and his

Year of the Flood, 1984. Year before Christ 1015.

to be built, adjoining to the old Jebus, or Jeruſalem [k]. The author of the Chronicles adds, that his hiſtory was penned by three cotemporary prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad [l]. His zeal, piety, and repentance are likewiſe celebrated in ſeveral places of the Old and New Teſtament; but that which raiſes his character above all the reſt is, that the promiſe of the Meſſiah, which had been made to Abraham, Jacob, and Judah, was fixed to that monarch's poſterity. Accordingly, the ſacred genealogiſts have given us the two lines of it, in which his birth was joined; namely, that of Nathan, from whom his virgin mother was deſcended, and that of Solomon, from which was ſprung Joſeph his reputed father [m].

Solomon, being ſeated on the throne, delayed not to fulfil his father's laſt injunctions. Adonijah obliged him to go the ſooner about it, by an action, which, though owing perhaps to a youthful indiſcretion, could not but render him ſuſhis ſucceſſor, according to the Jewiſh hiſtorian †. The Jews have added many fables concerning that monarch, too extravagant to be inſerted; the reader may gueſs at the reſt, by that which follows. They tell us, that David, foreſeeing that he ſhould die on the Sabbath, begged of God that he might die on any other day, becauſe on that he could neither weep for his ſins, nor order any thing concerning his burial. All he could obtain was, that he ſhould die towards the cloſe of the ſabbath; whereupon the devil, who owed him a ſpite, and had tried part of that day, in vain, to divert him from reading the law, that he might take that time to diſpatch him, bethought himſelf at length to go and ſhake ſome of his apple trees, which made the king haſten down a wooden ladder to go and catch the thief; but, in the mean time, Satan pulling it from under him, broke his neck with the fall. The conſequence was, that his corpſe was to remain there till the Sabbath was over, in danger of being devoured by his own dogs. They conſulted their Sanhedrin what muſt be done in that caſe, and were anſwered, that they ſhould ſtrew a good quantity of bread round his body, which pleaſing the dogs better than his fleſh, they left it untouched till ſun-ſet, when it was lawful to remove it to a ſafer place (78). The Mohammedans have not been behind hand with the Rabbies, in ſtuffing his hiſtory with monſtrous extravagances; the reader may, if he pleaſes, ſee them in the author quoted in the margin (79).

[k] 1 Kings ii. 1, & ſeq. [l] 1 Chron. cap. ult. ver. 29. [m] Compare Matth. i. 1, & ſeq. & Luke iii. 23, to 31.

† See before, p. 139, & 364.

(78) Vide Bartoloc. Bibliot. Rabbin. Baſnag. Hiſt. Jud. & al. Orient. ſub voc. David.

(79) D'Herbelot. Bibliot.

pected

pected of ſome further deſign, in concert with the turbulent Joab. We have lately obſerved, that it was looked upon as a treaſonable deſign againſt the regal dignity to marry, court, or to debauch any of the king's concubines; notwithſtanding which, Adonijah, obnoxious and diſgraced as he was for his late attempt upon the crown, was raſh enough to make uſe of Bathſheba's interceſſion, to obtain the king's leave to marry Abiſhag, the young Shunammitiſh virgin, who had been the cheriſher of David's old age; aſſuring her, that he deſired no other recompence for the loſs of a crown, which belonged to him by right of primogeniture. Bathſheba, glad perhaps to find that her ſon's rival would be ſatisfied at ſo eaſy a rate, made no difficulty to promiſe him her intereſt, not doubting of ſucceſs. Solomon, who expected nothing leſs than ſuch a requeſt from her, received her with all the marks of honour that were due to a queen and a mother, and had already promiſed to grant her ſuit; but when he heard the purport of it, he was ſo inraged at his ambitious brother, that he ordered him to be put to an immediate death, Joab, alarmed at the news, went and took ſanctuary at the horns of the altar, and there met with the puniſhment of his crimes, and was ſucceeded in his poſt of general by Benaiah, who had been before appointed his and Adonijah's executioner. The next in guilt was Abiathar, who had been one of the chiefs of Adonijah's conſpiracy; but the king contented himſelf with diveſting him of his ſhare of the high-prieſthood, and confining him to his own territories at Anathoth, in conſideration of his having carried the ark before his father, and been a ſharer in his afflictions. The king then ſent for Shimei, and told him, that though he thought him worthy of death, yet out of regard to his father's promiſe, he would put it in his power to ſave his life, by confining himſelf within the walls of Jeruſalem; but he aſſured him, at the ſame time, that if ever he ſtirred out of it, without his leave, his diſobedience ſhould coſt him his head. The old man, glad to come off ſo well, thanked the king for his unexpected clemency; but venturing ſome years after to tranſgreſs his orders, and to ride out after two run-away ſervants, was put to death for it at his return[n].

Adonijah and Joab put to death.

Solomon did not think it enough, that he had rid himſelf of two ſuch powerful enemies as Adonijah and Joab; he ſought to ſtrengthen himſelf ſtill more by marrying the daughter of the king of Egypt (B), who was then one of the most powerful princes about him, and Pharaoh gave her for dowry the city of Gezer, which he had taken from the Canaanites and burnt down to the ground; but which being rebuilt by Solomon, became a very considerable place [o].

[n] 1 Kings ii. paſſ.

the

HITHERTO the people used to resort to several high places, to offer up their devotions and sacrifices; but the most considerable was Gibeon, because the tabernacle, altar, and all the other sacred utensils, except the ark, were there. Whilst therefore the temple was building, Solomon used likewise to repair thither upon all solemn occasions, with a magnificence suitable to his dignity. Here, having at one time offered a thousand sacrifices, the Lord appeared to him in a dream, and promised to grant him whatever he should ask. The young monarch, conscious of the weight of his kingdom and the stubbornness of his subjects, begged only for such a degree of wisdom, as might enable him to govern with that prudence and sagacity, as became a king of Israel: which modest request was so pleasing to God, that he not only gave him such a share of wisdom and knowledge, as had never been possessed by any mortal, but superadded to it a promise of such other earthly blessings, as he had so judiciously over-

Solomon's choice of wisdom.

[o] Ibid. Ch. ix. 16.

(B) These kind of alliances were indeed forbidden by the Mosaic law (80); but it is supposed, that Solomon caused that princess to be instructed in, and to embrace the Jewish religion before he married her; because we do not find, that God did reprove him for it in that intercourse, which he had soon after with him; but on the contrary seemed well pleased with what he had hitherto done. It is true, that he is said afterwards to have been inticed to idolatry by his strange wives (81); but they were those whom he married towards the latter end of his reign, after he had, as it were, forsaken God. But Pharaoh's daughter seems to be excepted out of the case, unless we will suppose, that she relapsed to her former idolatry, when she saw him immersed in it.

However that were, he is generally believed to have composed the 45th Psalm, and the book of Canticles, as an epithalamium upon his marriage with that princess. As for her dowry, the city of Gezer, it had formerly belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and had been given by them to the Levites (82); but had been retaken by the Canaanites, and now, by her means, returned and continued in Israel.

(80) Deut. vii. 3. Jos. xxi. 21.

(81) 1 Kings xi. 1, & seq.

(82) Vid.

looked

looked. It was not long before he gave his people a proof of his excellent wiſdom and diſcernment, in the method he took to paſs a right judgment between two women, both contending for a living child, and diſclaiming the dead one with ſuch equal ardour, that it was thought impoſſible to adjudge the infants to their right mothers. But he ſoon found out an expedient to make nature itſelf unravel what reaſon could not by ordering the living child to be divided by a ſword between them, which ſo alarmed the real mother, that ſhe choſe rather to reſign him up whole to the pretended one, than to have him butchered before her eyes [p]. After this, the aſſembly could not be at a loſs where to aſſign the living child, nor what judgment to make concerning their young monarch's wiſdom, which was ſo much the more ſurpriſing and extraordinary, as he was then, at moſt, but twenty years of age, according to the chronology of our bibles and the learned archbiſhop Uſher †.

A pregnant proof of it.

IT became no leſs conſpicuous in the choice he made of his officers, and in the order and magnificence of his court, the proviſions for his houſe (C), the number and richneſs of his tables, chariots, horſes, ſtalls (D), and equipage; in the ſettling

His magnificence.

[p] Ibid. Ch. iii. † Sub Ann. M. 2971, & 2991.

(C) Theſe proviſions are ſaid to have amounted every day to thirty meaſures [each meaſure containing about eight buſhels and a half] of fine flour, double that quantity of common flour, ten fatted, and twenty paſture oxen, and an hundred ſheep; beſides veniſon, poultry, wild-fowl, fiſh, pulſe, fruit, herbs, and other eatables, which were ſent to him from all parts of the kingdom, under the direction of twelve officers, who took their turns, each in his reſpective month, and out of his reſpective canton (83).

(D) There is a conſiderable difference in the number of his ſtalls, between the book of Kings and that of the Chronicles; the former reckons them forty thouſand, and the latter but four thouſand (84), which laſt is preferred to the former, as the moſt reaſonable, becauſe Solomon is ſaid to have had but 1400 chariots (85); for if we allow four horſes to a chariot, which is double the number that chariots of war uſed to have, it will make in all but 5600, at which rate, there muſt have been more than ſix ſtalls to one horſe, contrary to common cuſtom, which allows ſeveral horſes to one ſtall (86). Some other authors take another way of reconciling the settling of his customs and finances (E), and the regulating of his guards and his army (F); which added to the vast number and valour of his subjects, and his immense riches, gave him such a powerful sway, that he lived in the profoundest peace, plenty, and grandeur of any prince of his time; beloved by his friends and allies, who were constantly pouring the richest presents upon him; feared by his enemies, receiving large tributes from several crowned heads (G), and resorted unto, from all parts of the world, for his excellent wisdom and magnificence, which brought in a continual concourse of strangers to his metropolis, and enriched it to such a degree, that gold and silver seemed to have lost their intrinsic value, by their extraordinary abundance. The very re-difference, which we cannot dwell upon (87). These horses, whatever their number was, were to be furnished with barley, straw, and other provender, by the same twelve commissioners we mentioned in the last note (88).

(83) 1 King. iv. 7, & ſeq. (84) Conf. 1 King. iv. 26. & 2 Chron. ix. 25. (85) Ibid. i. 14. 1 King. x. 26. (86) Vid. Lud. Cappel. Bochart. Pool. Synops. Le Seen. Eſſay on a new verſ. p. 2. ch. 7.

(E) Solomon was the first that brought chariots and horses into use in Israel, at least to any quantity: these he sent for out of Egypt; not only for his own use, but for several neighbouring kings, who were obliged to pay him six hundred shekels for every chariot and four horses, and a hundred and fifty for every single horse. He had likewise abundance of yarn, linen, and other commodities out of Egypt, which he sold to his subjects and merchants at a certain price (89); all which brought him a vast revenue, besides his navy, of which we shall speak anon.

(F) What standing army he kept, the scripture doth not tell us, and as he was in peace with all the world, and was either loved or feared by his neighbours, he doth not seem to have needed a great one. But besides the number of his chariots and horses, mentioned in a former note, the text says, that he had 12,000 horsemen (90), which some take to have been rather saddle-horses, and others his life-guard. However, it is certain that this multiplying of chariots and horses was expresly forbidden by the Mosaic law (91), whatever salvo he might find out to evade it, in a time of the profoundest peace. These he did not keep all at Jerusalem, but disposed of them in several of his strong cities, reserving only a convenient number about his person, either for guards or grandeur (92).

(G) The text says, that his dominion reached from the river Euphrates, or even beyond it, to the Nile, or borders of Egypt, and that all the kings of those countries were tributary to him (93).

(87) Vid. Calm. Com. in 1 Reg. 4. 25. Munst. Jun. & al. ibid. (88) 1 King. iv. ver. 27, 28. (89) 1 King. x. 28, 29. (90) Ibid. ver. 26. (91) Vid. Deut. xvii. 16. (92) 1 Kings x. 26. (93) Ibid. iv. 24. 2 Chron. ix. 26.

venuc

venue which his navy brought him in, excluſive of his cuſtoms, amounted to ſix hundred and ſixty ſix talents of gold. All this while his Iſraelitiſh ſubjects not only enjoyed the ſweets of peace and plenty, but alſo of an univerſal freedom. There were no other ſlaves, during his reign, except the poor Canaanites, and ſome captives of other nations [q].

Hiram's embaſſy and treaty with Solomon.

OF all the princes that ſought his friendſhip, Hiram, king of Tyre, David's old friend and ally, was the firſt who ſent embaſſadors to congratulate his acceſſion to the crown, and to offer his ſervice to him, as he had formerly done to his father. Solomon returned the embaſſy, and acquainted him with the deſign of his building the temple, deſiring him to ſend a ſufficient number of workmen, to join with his artificers, for the work; particularly, ſome that were well ſkilled in working in gold, ſilver, and other baſer metals, precious ſtones, ſcarlet, crimſon, and other fine dyes, all which was readily granted by the Tyrian king; in conſideration of which, Solomon agreed to furniſh him yearly with 20,000 meaſures of wheat, and 20,000 barrels of fine oil for his houſhold, beſides the ſame quantities of barley, wheat, wine, and oil, which he engaged to give to his ſervants that did the work. On the other ſide, Hiram was to ſend the cedars, fir, and other woods upon floats to Joppa, there to be delivered to Solomon's ſervants, and thence brought to Jeruſalem. He ſent him alſo a man of his own name, a Tyrian by birth, who was a ſecond Bezaleel, and was ſuch an excellent workman in all kinds of metals, ſtones, carving, engraving, embroidery, tapeſtry, and in making all ſorts of fine cloaths, that Hiram honoured him with the title of father. Him Solomon made overſeer of all the artiſts, whom David had formerly procured out of Tyre and Sidon. Theſe two princes made likewiſe an alliance together, which only ended with their lives (H) [r].

To

[q] 1 King. iv. 20, & ſeq. 2 Chron. ix. paſſ. [r] 1 King. v. paſſ.

(H) Joſephus aſſures us, that the letters which paſſed between them were ſtill preſerved in the archives of Iſrael and Tyre (94); he adds likewiſe, out of Dio and Menander, that thoſe two kings uſed to puzzle one another with riddles, and that the nonſolvent was obliged to pay ſome conſiderable forfeit to the propoſer. So that Hiram, having once received ſuch a one as he could not ſolve, was forced to pay Solomon a large ſum; which he however made

(94) Ant. lib. viii. c. 2.

The building of the temple.

To carry on this ſtupendous work with greater eaſe and ſpeed, Solomon cauſed an account to be taken of all the Canaanites, and other foreign ſlaves, that were in the land, and it was found to amount to 153,600; 70,000 of whom he appointed to carry burdens, 80,000 to hew timber and ſtone in the mountains, and the remaining 3,600 he appointed to be overſeers over them [r]. Beſides theſe ſtrangers, over whom he appointed ſome of his chief officers to overſee the work, he levied 30,000 men out of all Iſrael, whom he appointed to work in Lebanon one month in three, 10,000 every month, under the inſpection of Adoniram; theſe were likewiſe imployed in hewing wood, marble, and other ſtone, which was afterwards wrought by the Tyrian maſons and carvers, and thence conveyed to Joppa by water [t]. Whilſt theſe were preparing, Solomon, who had been ſtill adding immenſe quantities of gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, and other rich materials to thoſe which David had prepared before his death, did put them into proper hands, to be wrought into an almoſt infinite variety of ornaments. And the vaſt number of hands imployed, and the diligence of the overſeers and workmen was ſuch, that he was able to lay the foundation of this vaſt ſtructure in the fourth year of his reign, which was the ſecond after David's death, and the 480th after the exod [u]. This great work was begun on Monday the ſecond day of the month Zif, which anſwers to the 21ſt of our April [w], being the ſecond month of the ſacred, and eighth of the civil year; him to refund ſoon after, by getting one Abdemon, a Tyrian, to invent another, which proved too hard for that wiſe monarch (95). There is nothing improbable in all this; but what he and other learned Jews add, by way of appendix, to what the text records, concerning his extraordinary wiſdom, deſerves notice, though it were but for its abſurdity; for he makes one part of his knowledge to have conſiſted in the deepeſt receſſes of magic, in charms, evocation, and ejection of demons, and ſuch like witcheries, in which he was not content to be the experteſt man living, but took the pains to propagate that art, by writing ſeveral books upon that worthleſs ſubject (96). Credat Judæus!

[r] 2 Chr. ii. 17, 18. [t] 1 King. v. 9. [u] Ibid. vi. 1.
[w] Vid. USSER. Ann. ſub A. M. 3001.

(95) Lib. cont. Ap. p. 2. (96) Antiq. ub. ſup. vid. &. Bartoloc. Bibliot. rabbinic. ſub. voc. Salom.

and

and was carried on with ſuch prodigious ſpeed (I), that it was finiſhed in little more than ſeven years; if not in that magnificent manner, in which we have ſeen it repreſented in a vaſt number and variety of plans, and by ſome late models expoſed to public view; yet, at leaſt, in ſuch a rich and ſumptuous manner, as did eaſily excel any thing then extant of that kind. What is ſtill more ſurpriſing is, that every piece of it, whether timber, ſtone, or metal, was all finiſhed before it was brought to Jeruſalem, ſo that there were no other tools wanted or heard, than what were neceſſary to the joining of them to each other. The building finiſhed Year of the Flood, 1978. Year before Chriſt 1021.

AND here it will be doubtleſs expected, not only that we ſhould give our readers an exact deſcription of that wonderful edifice, but perhaps alſo, that we ſhould make ſome improvements upon thoſe authors who have gone before us, and diſcover new ornaments and excellencies, which they had overlooked. This is indeed no more than they pretend to have done with reſpect to one another, eſpecially of late years, not from any greater inſight they have gained into the ſacred language and writings, but from what they have fetched either out of the deſcription of the prophetic temple of Ezekiel, or from that of Joſephus, or from what the Jewiſh rabbies have been pleaſed to ſuperadd out of their own heads, in order to raiſe this ſacred fabric to the higheſt pitch of grandeur and richneſs. The truth is, whilſt thoſe paper architects can have their work and materials at ſo cheap a rate, it is next to impoſſible to keep a luxuriant fancy within due bounds, and not to act the panegyriſt, rather than the hiſto-

(I) This foundation, which took up the whole group of mount Moriah, did likewiſe coſt an immenſe labour to level, becauſe it conſiſted of ſeveral gibbous eminences, all of them ſolid rock, except the ſurface, ſome parts of which were to be conſiderably lowered, and others raiſed in proportion, in order to bring them to that capacious area; inſomuch that Joſephus ſays, a man could hardly believe his own eyes, when he beheld the ſtupendouſneſs of that work, the very contriving of which was enough to have crazed any brain but that of Solomon (97). It will indeed appear very ſurpriſing how ſuch a foundation could be laid, and the materials for the building could be in ſuch a forwardneſs, in ſo little a ſpace as four years, as to have been finiſhed in the ſeventh year after its foundation. But we ſee no reaſon againſt ſuppoſing that David, who had alſo ſent for a great number of Tyrian workmen long before his death, had already ſet them to this work, to prepare ſtone and timber, and to level the ground.

(97) Ant. ub. ſup. See Vol. II p. 339.

rian,

rian, in the rearing of this ſtately building. This is therefore what we would carefully avoid, though at the hazard of being taxed with running into the other extreme, whilſt we ſtrike off their three evidences, as far as they jar with, or exceed the account we have of it in the books of Kings and Chronicles.

For, after all, who has aſſured thoſe authors, that the temple of Ezekiel, which was only ſeen in a viſion, and was, for ought appears, only a type of that ſpiritual one under the goſpel, did bear a conſtant analogy with that of Solomon, with reſpect to its members, dimenſions, ſymmetry, and the like? Who knows not that that of Joſephus, allowing it to have been equal in beauty and magnificence to that author's deſcription of it, had received ſuch conſiderable additions and improvements from time to time, as might eaſily render it quite different from, not to ſay vaſtly excelling, that of Solomon? Laſtly, what diſcoveries can we hope for in this reſpect from the Talmudiſts and Jewiſh rabbies, who lived ſo many centuries after its final deſtruction, but what are of the ſame ſtamp with thoſe they have made with reſpect to religion; mere pious fables and forgeries, calculated to raiſe the honour of their nation? And if Ezekiel, Joſephus, and the rabbies muſt be ſet aſide, where ſhall we find an author that has not done ſo, or a deſcription of this edifice, that has not borrowed more from them, than from the ſacred hiſtorians? For theſe reaſons, we had once reſolved to ſpare our readers the charge of a new draught or deſcription of it, ſeeing we could offer them nothing new or authentic, without being at the pains of delineating it afreſh, according to the account we have of it in the books of the Kings and Chronicles, without any farther regard to the others, than as they helped to explain a doubtful paſſage, or ſome obſcure terms, ſuch as muſt unavoidably occur in great plenty, in deſcriptions of this nature, written at ſuch a diſtance of time, and in a language ſo little known as the Hebrew now is.

But whilſt we were deliberating whether we ſhould undertake ſo laborious a taſk, we were agreeably informed by a curious gentleman, a friend and encourager of this hiſtory, that having ſeen all the various deſcriptions of that edifice, and being diſſatisfied with their borrowing ſo much from thoſe authors we excepted againſt; he had ſome years ago prevailed upon a learned clergyman of his acquaintance, to make ſuch a delineation as we have been ſpeaking of, out of the two ſacred books abovementioned. He then favoured us with a ſight of the plans, and gave us time and leave to examine and compare them, and their proofs, with the original text; and when he found how much we approved of them, and that they could not but be very uſeful and acceptable to the curious, he not only made us a generous offer of the whole, to be communicated to the world, but gave us ſome opportunities of receiving farther ſatisfaction from his learned friend, touching any difficulties that might occur. However, as his demonſtrations from thoſe ſacred books, curious and exact as they are, would too ſenſibly interrupt the thread of our hiſtory, we think it will be more acceptable to our readers, if we join them with the plans of the city and temple in that ſuccinct and explanatory method, in which he has been ſince prevailed upon to adapt them to this work, that ſo both may at one view be compared, either with each other, or with any of thoſe deſcriptions that have hitherto appeared in the world (K). As

when

(K) It will not be amiſs however to obviate two objections which may be made againſt theſe new delineations; the firſt is, that it is more than probable, that the ſacred hiſtorians have omitted ſeveral particulars in their deſcriptions of that building, which, though perhaps of leſs conſequence, are yet of ſuch a nature, that one cannot well frame a juſt idea of the whole without them. This both our friend and we do readily grant, and therefore are far from giving this as a complete and perfect plan of the whole; all that is pretended is, that it contains all that the ſacred hiſtorians have mentioned of it, without having recourſe to Ezekiel, Joſephus, or the Talmudiſts, for a ſupply of what they have omitted. And we think it cannot be unacceptable to the curious, to ſee how much thoſe, who have followed the laſt mentioned authors, have added to what we find in the text; and to be able to diſtinguiſh what is authentic, from what is not ſo, by comparing this with theirs.

The next objection is, that the tears which the antients of Iſrael ſhed at the ſight of the ſecond temple, when they ſaw how far ſhort it was of the firſt †, ſeem to argue, at leaſt, that that of Solomon muſt have exceeded by far this of ours, ſeeing it is ſo much inferior to the deſcription which Joſephus, who had ſeen it, has left us of it. To this it may be anſwered,

1. That the diſparity between thoſe two temples which theſe elders bewailed, might not conſiſt ſo much in the largeneſs and magnificence of the building, as in the excellency of the work, and richneſs of its materials. We have ſeen what immenſe quantities of gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, and other coſtly things, had been beſtowed upon the firſt; but we read of nothing like it in the ſecond, neither indeed could they afford it.

† Ezra iii. 12.

2. Joſephus

As for the elevations of that edifice, we hope it will be thought a charge and trouble, which may be better ſpared, conſidering the vaſt number and variety we have already, and how little reaſon we have to be ſatisfied with any of them.

The Explanation at large of SOLOMON'S Temple, according to the Sacred Hiſtorians.

FOR the right underſtanding the deſcription in the annexed plate, we ſhall lay down the following preliminary obſervations.

I. Firſt, The temple of Solomon being our chief and proper object, we give the plan or ground-plot of it (which we declare to be our only taſk) whole and complete, juſt as we conceive it to have been: but Jeruſalem we repreſent only with an eye to thoſe parts, which bore ſome relation to the temple; ſuch as the palace on the ſouth, and the ſuburbs to the weſt, the valley between both, the horſe-gate towards the eaſt, and the like.

2. Joſephus and the rabbies deſcribe the ſecond temple after it was deſtroyed, when no man could contradict them; and how laviſh they might be in adorning a building which was the glory of their nation, we need not ſay; one thing is certain, that though it was become, in Joſephus's time, rather a ſtrong fortreſs, than a place of divine worſhip; yet there is hardly a man of ſenſe that believes half the wonders he ſays of it, or that it was capable of entertaining ſuch a prodigious gariſon as he affirms it did. And yet the Talmudiſts were ſo little ſatisfied with that author's deſcription, that they have made an incredible number of additions to it; inſomuch, that it looks rather like a new edifice of their own rearing, upon which they have beſtowed all the grandeur and magnificence that their luxuriant fancy could muſter up.

But laſtly, allowing it to have been equal to their deſcription, it doth not follow, that that of Zerubbabel, over which the elders wept, was ſo; which having been burnt, rebuilt, improved, inriched inlarged, and fortified, from time to time, and by ſeveral royal hands, had not perhaps one footſtep left of its primitive figure, except in the very ſanctuary. It is therefore in vain to pretend to gueſs, either at that of Solomon or Zerubbabel, by that which we have in Joſephus; or to object the largeneſs and magnificence of this laſt, againſt the ſeeming plainneſs which our friend gives us of the firſt.

II. Secondly,

EXPLANATION of the Plan of the Temple of Jeruſalem.

a THE Oracle, or moſt Holy Place

b The Sanctuary or Holy Place

c The Porch

d The Wall

e { The Door of the Oracle / The Door of the Sanctuary

f The Veil or Partition

g The chambers about the Temple

h The Stair-caſe

i The two Pillars

k The altar of Burnt-Offerings

l The Court of the Prieſts

m The Wall between the Court

n The New Court

o The Walls of the Prieſts Courts

p The Doors of the Prieſts Court

q The great Court

r The Eaſt North and South Gates of the great Court, with the Ward Rooms on each ſide of the ſaid Gates

ſ The Houſes called Aſuppim

t Other Houſes in each Corner of the Great outer Court

u The Gate Shallecheth

x The Gate Parbar

y The Entry of the King

z The King's Throne.

PART OF MOUNT SION

A PLAN of the TEMPLE of JERUSALEM, Built by KING SOLOMON as it is found recorded in the Books of Kings and Chronicles

SION

The Valley

North

East

The Horse Gate

The Horse Gate corner

The Gate Miphkad

A Scale of Cubits 40 in an Inch

D. P Scul

II. Secondly, We pretend to no other knowledge of the temple, but what we have from ſcripture in terminis, or the clear ſenſe of it; and where that fails, we only beg to be allowed the uſe of criticiſm, and reaſonable or plauſible conjecture; for beyond theſe we have no other evidence. How great ſoever the learning of ſome moderns may be, much greater, we own, than any we pretend to, yet what they aſſert has no weight, unleſs they can bring ſuch manner of proof as that which we ourſelves intend to uſe. Whether they or we beſt ſtand the teſt, muſt be left to the judgment of the reader, that will be at the pains of peruſing theſe ſheets with ſome attention, and of comparing our plan with any other now extant. As for antient authors, we have none to produce beſides Joſephus, and other Jews, rather of a later date than he. Now all we might learn from them, that has no foundation in holy writ, to us is no evidence at all. Much they knew, or pretended to know, from tradition, but that we preſume is not to be depended upon. We know no monuments they had beſide thoſe we have ourſelves: And the Hebrew tongue, properly ſo called, being a ſort of dead language at the time theſe authors writ, it may well be doubted, without ſinning againſt modeſty, whether they, who had no other books to learn it by, than thoſe that are now in uſe, could underſtand it better than thoſe that ſtudy it at preſent. Nay more, it might be ſhewn, we dare ſay, that Joſephus underſtood not ſome of thoſe few Hebrew words he pretends to explain in his Hiſtory of the Jews (A).

III. Thirdly,

(A) This is the more to be wondered at, becauſe Joſephus boldly aſſerts, at the end of his Jewiſh antiquities (1), That there were none of his countrymen ſo perfect in that ſort of learning as he was. But we are not alone in our opinion of him; though the late editor of his works, taking his bare word for it, ſets him off in the margin (2) as a very learned hebraean: Bochart (3) and Huetius (4), not to name any more, have openly declared themſelves quite oppoſite to that eulogium of Joſephus by Dr. Hudſon. Some indeed have tried to bring him off upon a ſuppoſition his writings were interpolated; which is not unlikely in ſome inſtances (5); and truly he himſelf ſhould not be charged with the blunders of either his tranſcribers or

(1) Lib. xx. c. 10. p. 903. (2) Joſephus in hebræis literis verſatiſſimus. (3) Hieroſ. lib. ii. c. 9. p. 154. (4) Dem. Evang. Prop. iv. p. 175, 199. (5) Vid. Antiq. lib. iii. c. 7. p. 112. De Veſt. Sacerd. & V. 8. 213. etym. Samſon.

III. Thirdly, We do admit of Ezekiel as a divinely inſpired prophet; and therefore what he has ſaid or written tranſlators. We ſhould think what is read in his manuſcripts (6), that the Hebrews called the ark Heoron and many ſuch other ſtrange names (7), is no fault of the hiſtorian, but of thoſe that copied his writings, and the ſame we judge of the tranſlations. The French one, though much valued, ſays, The ark was made of an incorruptible wood, the Hebrews call Heoron; and truly ſo the Latin has it, which the French exactly followed, though pretending, in the title, the tranſlation was made from the Greek original; and Roger L'eſtrange here treads in Dandilly's ſteps heartily. However, to us it is probable, that Joſephus, being about to give in Greek the word in Hebrew for the ark, he wrote ἡ δὲ ἄρων, or as Dr. Bernard of Oxford would have it (8), ἡ δὲ ἴρων. Now pronounce it either way, Aron with the Hebrews, or Eron with the Chaldeans, the word itſelf ſignifies a Trunk, as was the ark, and Joſephus is right enough, though others have wronged him in relating his words. But what ſeems thereabouts (9) to be Joſephus's own fault, is the interpretation of what his manuſcripts and editions both call Chethonene; which, he ſays, ſignifies a linen coat, becauſe it is Chethon we call linen; now begging his pardon, Chetoneth, the Hebrew word, or Chethoneh, as the Chaldeans pronounce it, may be alſo a coat of wool. Not to obſerve the Chethoneth of many colours Joſeph wore (10), or that that hanged like a robe about Tamar (11), poſſibly were not of linen, thoſe moſt ſurely our firſt parents were cloathed with are ſaid (12) to be of ſkin. Accordingly, we are told, thoſe of the prieſts were of linen (13), on purpoſe that they ſhould not be thought of ſome other ſtuff. But finding Chethon, or Kethan, for linen, in the vulgar language of Jeruſalem, Joſephus thought Chethoneth in holy writ to ſignify a coat of linen; which indeed does not look ſo ſtrange as the etymology he ſeems to give (14) of Jeruſalem being a compound of the Greek Hieron, a ſacred thing, and the word Soluma, unleſs this alſo be an interpolation. And the ſame one might ſay concerning Bezetha, which Joſephus (15) makes to ſignify the New City, when no ſuch thing can be made out of that word. But if it be worth while to gueſs at it, בצה Baſath, as it is a root, or radical word, ſeems to be preſerved in that well known derivative among the Turks, viz. Boſtangi, a gardener; and among the Rabbins in Buſtan, a garden. So that it is not unlikely, that part of Jeruſalem, that lay northward of the temple, viz. Bezetha, before it was built into ſtreets, was the gardening place for the city, and kept its antient name, as is ſtill cuſtomary among our ſelves on ſuch like occaſions.

(6) Lib. iii. c. 6. p. 110. (7) ἰώρων, ἱερώνυμον, ἱερωνυμία, ἱερωνυμία, ἱερὸν. (8) In loc. ed. Sheld. p. 166. 4. (9) Vide Hieron. Numb. 2. (10) Gen. xxxvii. 3. (11) 2 Sam. xiii. 18. (12) Gen. iii. 21. (13) Exod. xxviii. xxxix. paſſ. (14) Antiq. lib. vii. c. 3. p. 287. (15) Bell. Jud. lib. v. c. 4. p. 1223.

ough

ought to be received by us as moſt true. But then we take it, he has not given us a deſcription of the temple of Solomon, but of quite another; a prophetic or emblematical temple, that never exiſted but in the revelation that was made to him, and the repreſentation he has ſet down in his prophecy. He himſelf ſays [a], In the viſions of God brought he me into the land of Iſrael------and ſaid unto me, Behold with thine eyes, for to the intent that I might ſhew unto thee art thou brought hither. Declare all that thou ſeeſt to the houſe of Iſrael-------and much more to the ſame purpoſe. Now it does not ſeem probable at all, that there wanted ſo much care and ſolemnity to ſhew the prophet a temple he had himſelf ſeen a hundred times over and over; he, as it is well known, being a prieſt [b] who had there officiated, and had no need of divine inſpiration to tell his countrymen the Jews what moſt of them could not well be ignorant of, or rather were well inſtructed in. And if it ſhould be urged that this might well be forgotten in a captivity of 70 years (B), I will readily allow it, and all that can be drawn from this conceſſion, provided it be proved, that any uſe was made of this ſo ſolemn a deſcription, in their building of the temple, after the return from the captivity; but ſo far was it from it, that at the ſight of the ſecond temple many tears were ſhed, this ſecond temple built by Zerubbabel being much inferior to that they had ſeen of Solomon's building [c]; and what then, if compared with that of Ezekiel? for this temple (and that is the thing we dare rely upon) had no proportion as to its meaſures with that other of Solomon. Whether any body has ever apprehended Solomon's temple to have been of each ſide above 500 cubits (C), we do not know: but that would be nothing to Ezekiel's, which was 500 reeds [d], that is to

[a] Ezek. xl. 2,—4. [b] Ezek. i. 3. [c] Ezra iii. 12. [d] Ezek. xlii. 15. 20.

(B) This revelation was made to Ezekiel in the 25th year of the ſaid captivity, and but the 14th after the taking of Jeruſalem by the Babylonians (16).

(C) The temple may well be taken for the whole ground on which it ſtood, with all its courts, and truly that name muſt be taken in this latitude, in our tranſlation of the goſpel; in Greek it is ἱερὸν, which might be properly turned into Engliſh by a conſecrated place, or ground (17); and the Jews, who commonly call it Har habbaith, mountain of the houſe, ſay it was a ſquare of 500 cubits (18).

(16) Ezek. xl. 1. (17) Matth. xxi. 12. Mark xi. 16. Coll. 17. & al. paſſ. (18) Tract. Midd. c. 2. ext tit. הר־הבית.

ſay, 3000 cubits, for it is well known that a reed was ſix cubits (D); ſo that here is a difference as of ſix to one in their extent or encloſure, which is impoſſible to be thought or ſaid of one and the ſame temple. But you will ſay it might be the ſame except the encloſure: I anſwer, no; becauſe the mountain had no proportion to ſuch a one, no not by any jettees, or other ways you can imagine; for the ſquare being 2000 reeds, will not give you leſs than 12000 and odd cubits, or about 4500 paces. Now Jeruſalem itſelf was never ſo large (E); how then can we ſuppoſe the tem-

[e] Ezek. xl. 5.

(D) What theſe cubits were, has been obſerved chap. 7. of this hiſtory (19), to be almoſt equal to 22 inches, which is not improbable. Some indeed would increaſe the cubit to a greater length and others reduce it to ours of 18 inches, which yet could not affect our argument, becauſe which ſoever of the divers hypotheſes be the nearer the truth, it makes no difference here in the main, the cubit not being conſidered in itſelf, but comparatively to the meaſuring reed, ſaid to be (20) ſix cubits by a cubit and a hand-breadth, or, according to the Septuagint, ſix cubits and one hand-breadth beſides.

(E) Though we know what he does relate out of Hecatæus, who, in the reign of Ptolemy Lagus, makes the circuit of Jeruſalem almoſt 50 ſtadia πενήκοντα μάλιστα (21) σταδίων τὸν περίμετρον, which indeed Joſephus does not correct, though he himſelf does not reckon this renowned city's largeſt extent to have been above 33 ſtadia, τῆς πόλεως δὲ ὀπτὰς κύκλος σταδίων ἦν τριάκοντα τριῶν (22). Now a ſtadium, as is well known, being 125 paces, 33 ſtadia will produce 4125 paces, which would reduce the whole extent of the city to three ſtadia, 375 paces leſs than that of the temple. There is indeed a book written in Dutch (23) by the learned Camp. Vitringa, wherein he undertakes to make void this our argument, by obſerving, that the 2000 reeds are to be underſtood only of ſo many cubits, as the Septuagint have expreſſed it in their tranſlation; and to make it anſwer in the Hebrew text, he ſuppoſes the word there (24) to ſignify by an ellipſis, cubits of a reed, that is to ſay, ſuch cubits as ſix of them make up one reed. But whether this will ſatisfy, we muſt leave to the judgment of our readers.

(19) See before, p. 269. not. R. Vid. Cumberland's Eſſay on weights and meaſures, p. 39, &c. (20) Ezek. xl. 5. (21) Ap. Jos. cont. Ap. Bel. Jud. lib. 1. p. 1348. (22) Jos. cont. Ap. Bel. Jud. lib. 5. c. 4. p. 1223. (23) בקנה Bikneh, with a reed; or, with the meaſuring reed. Ezek. xlii. 16, &c. (24) Den Tempel Ezechiels, cap. xli.

ple

ple to have been ſo, that was but part of that city? Beſides, Joſephus [f], in the dimenſions he gives us of Herod's temple, that he had himſelf ſeen, and was by far the largeſt of the three, does not exceed 4 ſtadia, or 500 paces. In a word, never any real temple, built upon Moriah, was any thing near ſo big as that temple Ezekiel ſaw and delineated by inſpiration.

IV. A fourth obſervation, very neceſſary to be attended to, is the true ſituation of Jeruſalem, as to its two principal parts, well known by the names of two mountains, viz. Sion and Acra [g], on which ſtood the upper and lower city; for Sion was a good deal higher or loftier than Acra. They roſe like two huge heaps one againſt another, with a valley between them, by which they were ever, and are ſtill parted, though not, as it is eaſy to imagine, without ſome very great alteration in their particular form or figure. The temple was built upon mount Moriah [h], which was either part of mount Sion, or a hill of leſs compaſs near it. That Moriah ſtood to the eaſt is not diſputed; but whether Sion was on the ſouth or the north, has been a queſtion among the learned. This an eye-witneſs could eaſily have determined, if any one had favoured us with a map exactly drawn, or anſwered the queſtion in expreſs terms: For all this we could try to clear it by the help of the ſacred monuments, which, thanks to the learned Reland [i], would prove an eaſy taſk, but too prolix for this performance; and therefore we chooſe to refer to that author for a full ſatisfaction about it. However, it is pretended that Iſaiah [k] leaves room to think, that Sion lay northwards of the lower city: For, ſays the king of Babylon, as he is introduced ſpeaking by the prophet, I will ſit upon the mount of the congregation in the ſides of the north. But it is not ſaid here mount Sion lay on the north of Acra; what is ſaid ſeems to be, that the conqueror would eſtabliſh his dominion where was the king's palace, bordering upon the ſouth of the temple, and ſituate on the northern ſide of mount Sion. There the Babylonian thinks himſelf ſecure, and in full poſſeſſion of the city. But ſays the prophet to him, alluding to the valley bordering upon mount Sion, towards Acra, Thou ſhalt be brought down to the ſides of the pit. This [f] Antiq. xv. ult. p. 702. [g] Vid. Joſef. Deſcript. ap. JOSEPH. Bell. Jud. lib. v. c. 4. p. 1221. coll. & 1235. [h] 2 Chron. iii. 1. comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 18. & 1 Chron. xxi. 18.—28. xxii. 1. [i] Vid. Palæſt. illuſtr. p. 839. [k] Cap. xiv. ver. 13.

ſituation

situation of Sion, which might be further proved from Josephus [l], besides our judicious traveller the Rev. Mr. Maundrell [m], and the Paris citizen Antoine Regnault [n], we did insist upon, because very great men [o], have appeared on the opposite side, who by their uncommon learning may draw others into the same error.

V. THE fifth observation will give us the true situation of the temple. 'Tis known that when the Hebrews did worship, they turned themselves towards the most holy place or temple [p]. Now we learn from what Ezekiel saw, that it lay westward of its door or entry. His words are very plain, Behold, says he [q], at the door of the temple were about five and twenty men, with their backs toward the temple, and their faces toward the east; and they worshipped the sun toward the east; therefore the front of the temple was turned toward the east (F); and this is confirmed by Josephus [r], who so far must be right, the temple having at first been in the same situation he saw it in afterwards.

VI. Lastly, Though our proper enquiry be into what appears to us to be strictly true, as to this matter of Solomon's temple, yet we do not pretend, that all that is true of it has been said by us, because it is possible, many things about it may have been omitted by the sacred historians, and therefore,

[l] Ubi sup. p. 1222. & 1230. [m] A Journey from Aleppo, &c. p. 67. 76, 78, 86, 99, 100. [n] Discours du voyage d'outremer au S. Sepulcre, 1573. p. 47. 92, 140, &c. Add LE BRUYN. Voyage au Levant, tom. ii. c. 53, 55. [o] DRUS. ad voc. N. T. voce Sion. LIGHTFOOT, CELLARIUS, CALMET. &c. passim. [p] 1 Kings viii. 48. Psal. cxxxviii. 2. Dan. vi. 10. [q] Ezek. viii 16. [r] Antiq. lib. viii. c. 3. p. 342.

(F) Theodoret it seems gives a very good reason for it, viz: That as the Israelites were commanded to worship God alone, they might have the sun behind their backs, turning themselves towards the tabernacle, and not adore the sun, but his maker; and truly when the custom prevailed among the Christians of turning their faces towards the east in their worship, the Pagans did upbraid them with adoring the sun (25). But the author of the apostolical constitutions knew well how to put it in another view, for the holy apostles are introduced by him, saying, προσευχίσθω δὶ κατὰ ἀνατολάς, &c. τ. λ. (26).

(25) Solem credunt Deum nostrum, says Tertull. Apol. cap. xvi.
(26) Lib. vii. c. 44.

as

as has been intimated, cannot in any wiſe be ſaid by others. Neither do we aver, that all we intend to ſay is exactly true or certain. Once more we muſt be ſo plain with our readers, as to let them know, that we do not pretend to give demonſtrations, but probable conjectures. And if our weak endeavours are not ſatisfactory, we ſhould be very glad by them to put others upon gratifying the world with a ſcheme more accurate, wherein all things, appearing better connected, might alſo better anſwer, or be more agreeable to the ſeveral paſſages or texts of holy writ here under conſideration. All then we do engage on our part is carefully to diſtinguiſh between thoſe things we have a full proof of, and thoſe things wherein we only try to make ſome near approaches towards the truth; and upon this foot will now be explained the ſeveral particulars in the plan before us, according to the indication of them by the letters in the margin, for the greater conveniency of finding out whatever may ſeem to want a review, or deſerve to be more narrowly looked or inquired into.

a WE begin with the Oracle (G), where God did ſpeak from between the cherubim[r]; accordingly it is called the Oracle of his Holineſs, or, as it is otherwiſe tranſlated, His Holy Oracle[s], towards which the Iſraelites turned themſelves when they did worſhip[u]; and this was a ſquare room of twenty cubits, as appears from 1 Kings vi. 2, 20. 2 Chron. iii. 8.

b THE holy place, or Sanctuary, 40 cubits long, and 20 broad, as is plain from 1 Kings vi. 2, & 3. where it is alſo called [r] Exod. xxv. 22. Pſal. xcix. 1. [s] Pſal. xxviii. 2. [u] See before, p. 285. & comp. Pſal. xxviii. 2.

(G) In Hebrew, דְּבִיר Debir, as if one ſhould ſay Locutorium, or ſpeaking-place. For there it was that God uſed to ſpeak, or give his orders, or inſtructions, to his lieutenant, if one may ſo call the judge or prince, and to the high-prieſt, his firſt miniſter. Beſides, it was called the oracle of the houſe, and moſt holy place, Heb. holy; or, as the Septuagint (27), holy of holies, and as it is tranſlated (28) concerning the tabernacle, the holieſt of all (29).

The Septuagint have kept the Hebrew word reading it δαβιρ or δαβιρ, except in one place, where it is tranſlated ναὸς or temple.

(27) Exod. xxv. 22. Numb. vii. 89. (28) 1 Kings viii. 6. Pſal. xxviii. 2. (29) Hebr. ix. 3.

the

the Temple of the House. For the House (H) might properly be the name of the two apartments [w], but that of the Temple (I) the proper name [x] for the second apartment: However, the length of both these together, being the House and (K) Temple of God [y], was sixty cubits, 1 Kings, vi. 2.

c BEFORE the Sanctuary stood a Porch. Twenty cubits was the length thereof, and ten cubits was the breadth thereof, as is said ver. 3. and so far we have a certainty from the books of Kings and Chronicles. To which we might, if needful, add the authority of Josephus [z] and numbers of others.

d As for the Wall between the porch and the temple, any one sees it ought to be there admitted, though never mentioned in so many words by the sacred historians. We say it appears to have been of great use, not only better to sustain the building, but also to separate the temple from the porch belonging to it; so that this temple might stand wholly by itself, and also be shut up when there was occasion for it.

[w] 1 Kings vi. 5, & pass. [x] Ibid. ver. 17. [y] Ps. v. 5. comp. xxviii. 2. [z] Pag. 342.

(H) הבית Habbaith, or בית Baith, an house (30), by way of excellency. It was the house of God, and in some sense that of the Israelites also; wherefore they say (31), Our holy and beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee However, the house of the Lord is indifferently taken for the whole, or part, of the building.

(I) היכל Hecal is properly a palace, witness the [becal] palace of Ahab (32), and by this name seem to be called the different parts belonging to the tabernacle (33). The Septuagint translate it ναὸς most frequently, and sometimes οἶκος.

(K) Well might it be called so, when it was the place of his residence among the Israelites. So says Solomon (34), I have surely built thee an house to dwell in; a settled place for thee to abide in. And therefore the Jews have given the name of Shekinah to this habitation not improperly, for there was God's symbolical presence upon the ark (35), or, as it were, his throne; and there also was a real presence conspicuous by its operations, I mean by the oracles which God delivered there.

(30) 1 Kings viii. 16. (31) Isaiah lxiv. 11. (32) 1 Kings xxi. 1. (33) 1 Sam i. 9. iii. 3. (34) 1 Kings viii. 13. (35) 1 Sam iv. 4. 2 Sam. vi. 2. Psal. lxxx. 1.

e BUT further our conjecture is ſtrengthened by this plain inference, that the temple had doors. Thus it is ſaid [a], For the entering of the oracle he made doors [b], ------ ſo alſo made he for the entering (L) of the temple, poſts of olive tree, ---- and the two doors were of fir-tree. Now a door ſeems to ſuppoſe a wall, wherever a wall appears to be neceſſary, as was here. And ſhould it be objected, that the oracle had a door as well as the ſanctuary, though we do not conceive any wall between them, it might be anſwered, that there is nothing upon record concerning ſuch a wall (M); that we ſee no neceſſity for one; and laſtly, that there might be ſomething elſe in lieu of it.

f FOR a very rich and ſtrong Vail was made to ſeparate the moſt holy from the holy place [c], the ſame we ſuppoſe, as St. Matthew calls the vail of the temple that was rent in twain when Jeſus yielded up the Ghoſt [d]. Joſephus [e] poſitively tells us, that Solomon made a partition wall, different from the vail; but this is not ſo clearly expreſſed in the ſacred books. The tranſlation indeed ſays [f]. He made a partition by the chains of gold before the oracle: and accordingly we may underſtand, that there was both a partition and a vail, the partition being fixed, and the vail hanging before it, ſo as to be moved like our curtains. But we do not warrant that this is the true ſenſe of the Hebrew (N), which is rather, He placed

[a] 1 Kings vi. 31. [b] Ibid. 33, 34. [c] 2 Chron. iii. 14. [d] Matth. xxvii. 50, 51. [e] Ant. lib. viii. c. 3. p. 343. [f] 1 Kings vi. 21.

(L) The word in Hebrew is פֶּתַח Petach, the ſame as for the oracle above, and therefore entering ought to be kept in Engliſh, not door, as in our tranſlation; although Petach, an entering, is in other places tranſlated a door, by a true analogy.

(M) This muſt be underſtood of holy writ, wherein no mention is made of any ſuch wall, though indeed our tranſlation ſays, as to the door of the oracle, "the lintel and ſide-poſts were a fifth part "of the wall." But thoſe laſt words are not in the Hebrew, and truly another interpretation is given in the margin, viz. that they were five ſquare; however, the reading in the text may well be admitted relatively to the height of the oracle, ſo that this is meant, that the lintel, &c. were five cubits high.

(N) וַיַּעֲבֵר בְּרָתֵי קוֹרֵת Vajehabber Beratikoth, or, according to the keri, Beratoukoth, which is verbatim, he made paſs with chains, ſuppoſing ratikoth to be chains, for that word occurs in no other text but this, and may be as well tranſlated bars, or bolts, or any placed chains (bars or bolts) croſs the oracle: However, there was a door to it, as we have ſeen already. And although we may eaſily conceive a door without a wall, properly ſo called, we muſt ſuppoſe ſome ſuch thing as a partition. Beſides, what bolted this door, or went acroſs before the oracle, was of gold, and therefore not the vail itſelf. At leaſt the Hebrew text allows us to ſay the oracle was ſhut up with golden bolts. Yet whether there was a partition beſides the door of each ſide [g], or whether the door itſelf ſerved inſtead of a partition, we ſhall not determine (O); but conclude this article by ſaying, that the doors of the porch are mentioned as ſuch in one paſſage [h], and called the doors of the houſe of the Lord in another [i].

g WHAT we are now to conſider are the Chambers, built againſt the wall of the houſe round about, both of the temple and the oracle, the nethermoſt ſaid to be five cubits broad, and alſo five cubits high [k]; but of their length we find nothing in the books we refer to. It ſeems they were ſquare rooms: Joſephus tells us [l], they were thirty in number all about the temple; which, it may be, he took from that of Ezekiel [m], who ſays, The ſide chambers were three, one over another, and thirty in order: So that thirty being multiplied thing equivalent. Hence then it ſeems Joſephus (36) took, "the "in and the out-ſide of the temple was all lined with cedar, and that "the cramping of the cedar together with ſtrong chains, (ἁλύσεσι, "not irons as L'eſtrange has it) was a great ſtrength and ſecurity to "the building." However, pro materiâ ſubjectâ, to make paſs with chains; or, as it might be tranſlated without the particle (37), to make chains paſs, ſeems to be nothing elſe but to chain, or tie with chains, to bolt, or bar; unleſs the word vail be ſupplied to fill up the gap of this expreſſion, well underſtood at that time, though afterwards, being obſcure and obſolete, it was omitted by the Septuagint. The Vulgate ſays, he faſtened the boards with nails.

[g] 1 Kings vi. 31. [h] 2 Chron. xxix. 7. [i] Ibid xxviii. 24. [k] 1 Kings vi. 5, 6, 10. [l] Antiq. viii. c. 3. p. 342. [m] Ezek. xli. 6.

(O) It will hardly be expected we ſhould here take particular notice of thoſe ſacred veſſels and utenſils that adorned this holy houſe, viz. the ark, and cherubims, the table of ſhew-bread, the golden candleſticks (38), and the altar of incenſe; ſince we could hardly add any thing, that is needful concerning them, to what hath already been obſerved in the courſe of this hiſtory.

(36) Antiq. viii. c. 3. p. 343. (37) Comp. Lamentat. i. 17. Pſal. lv. 18. (38) See 1 Kings vii. 49.

by

by three, according to the number of ſtories in the firſt book of Kings, thoſe chambers will amount in all to ninety, that are called the nethermoſt, the middle, and the third. And ſuch a number may eaſily be placed about the houſe, ſuppoſing them to have been each of five cubits length, as well as height, for in the breadth they differed from five to ſix, and from ſix to ſeven; the reaſon of which is there given. Upon this ſcore they will undoubtedly appear ſomewhat ſmall, and ſo indeed Joſephus [n] calls them. However if their uſe was well known, that might give ſome light into this matter. But concerning their uſe we find only [•], that Joaſh was hidden in the bed-chamber (P) belonging to the temple. Taking it then for granted, that they were chiefly or frequently intended to lye in, we may venture to ſay, that they were ſufficient for that purpoſe, eſpecially thoſe of the middle and third ſtory. Beſides that, the bed-chambers among the Jews were generally upper rooms, as has already been obſerved in this Univerſal Hiſtory [p].

b ONE thing more remains to be attended to about the temple, properly ſo called. It is ſaid [q], The door for the middle chamber was in the right ſide of the houſe, and they went up with winding ſtairs into the middle chamber, and out of the middle into the third. Where we may well imagine an opening was left in the thickneſs of the wall for a pair of ſtairs, to go up to the ſecond ſtory of the chambers about the temple, and alſo a paſſage from the temple to the porch; for there might be ſeveral occaſions that required the miniſters of the temple to go up to thoſe chambers, as well as in and out of the temple, of which we ſuppoſe a detail is not here expected.

[n] βραχέισιν οἴκοις ubi ſupr. [•] 2 Kings xi. 2. [p] See before, p. 367. [q] 1 Kings vi. 8.

(P) In Hebrew, חדר Heder or Cheder, and ſeems to be underſtood of one of the three ſtories about the temple (39), where might be the beds for the prieſts in waiting, and among thoſe rooms or chambers, one, or more, eſpecially reſerved, or ſet apart for the high-prieſt; which alſo ought therefore to have been a retired place, and not eaſily acceſſible but to himſelf and conſort, with thoſe they truſted. Theſe rooms we find alſo called inner parlours (40), where for parlours the Hebrew hath Chadarim, and there diſtinguiſhed from the lower apartments, Ganſakim, (the treaſuries in our verſion), and from the upper rooms. So as we have here the ſeveral parts of the Jaxiah (41), it ſeems, by their proper names.

(39) See 1 Kings vi. & ſeq. (40) 1 Chron. xxviii. 11. (41) 1 Kings vi. 5.

i WE are now come to the Porch, where we meet with thoſe celebrated columns, or pillars, Solomon adorned it with. It is ſaid [r], He ſet them up in the porch of the temple, and [t] he made before the houſe two pillars, and [t] he reared up the pillars before the temple; which expreſſions taken together ſufficiently ſeem to imply the pillars were before the temple in its porch. But it is not quite ſo eaſy to aſſign the height of them. In one place it is ſaid of Solomon [u], He caſt two pillars of braſs of eighteen cubits high apiece. In another [x] we read, He made two pillars of thirty and five cubits high. This ſeeming inconſiſtency between the two ſacred hiſtorians we ſhall preſently reconcile; only we will firſt beg leave to take notice, that this is an inſtance of their not combining together, of their not being corrected or amended by one another. Now let us only ſuppoſe the pedeſtal or baſis of the columns to have been 17 cubits high, this added to the 18 cubits (1 Kings vii. 15 Jer. lii. 21.) for the ſhaft, will, added together, make exactly 35, the number mentioned 2 Chron. iii. 15. Laſtly taking from 1 Kings vii. 16. five cubits, being the height of the chapiter, we ſhall have the true height of the pillars, viz. 40 cubits. It is true that in another place [y] the height of the chapiter is ſaid to have been three cubits; but here we apprehend we have the dimenſion of the chapiter only, ſtrictly ſo called, Cothereth in the Hebrew, or Crowning, which is expreſſed to have been three cubits; and there is left to be underſtood the wreathen work on it round about, which was two cubits more; both which ſums added make that of five, the number ſet down before by the ſame author. We can ſay but little concerning the thickneſs of the ſhaft of thoſe pillars, only that a line of twelve cubits did compaſs either of (Q) them

[r] 1 Kings vii. 21. [t] 2 Chron. iii. 15. [t] Ibid. ver. 17.
[u] 1 Kings vii. 15. [x] Chron. ubi ſup. [y] 2 Kings xxv. 17.

(Q) Some will ſay, the Hebrew differs from our tranſlation; for what is here either of them, is there (השני Haſheni) the ſecond, and we acknowledge this is a ſeeming, though no real, difference. It is ſaid, Eighteen cubits was the height of the firſt column, and a line of twelve cubits did encompaſs the ſecond; which is an elliptical expreſſion, where, in a period, one branch of it not expreſſed, is underſtood by what the other expreſſes (42). So here the height

(42) Vid. Prov. x. 1. Iſai. xxxii. 3. Deut. xv. 12. Pſalm cxlii. 4. Conf. Jerem. lii. 21, 22.

of

them round about [z], and therefore the diameter was four cubits, which is the proportion of 12 for the circumference. But it may be further obſerved, that one of the pillars was to be ſeen on the right of the porch, and called Jachin, and the other on the left called Boaz [a]. Now Jachin ſignifies he ſhall eſtabliſh, and Boaz, ſtrength is in him. By which it ſeems Solomon would give to underſtand, that he depended only on an Almighty Power for the continuance and duration of this temple. But by way of conjecture one might ſuppoſe, there was an inſcription in ſome ſuch ſenſe upon the baſis of each of the pillars, that on one beginning with the word Jachin, and that on the other with the word Boaz; from whence the pillars might have their denomination; as we ſee the books of Moſes called by the firſt word they begin with *. Laſtly, as to their ſituation; we take it they ſtood before the temple [b], in the porch of the temple [c]: So ſays our tranſlation, which we chooſe here to follow (R).

[z] 1 Kings vii. 15. [a] 1 Kings vii. 21. * See before. p. 152. not. A. [b] 2 Chron. iii. 17. [c] 1 Kings vii. 21.

of the firſt column gives you the meaſure of the ſecond, and the thickneſs of the ſecond the meaſure of the firſt. But this not being agreeable to our ſtyle, another turn ought to be taken which is uſual and intelligible in our way of ſpeaking.

(R) One reaſon is the difference to be obſerved between the two particles in the texts of Chronicles and Kings In that it is על-פני Alpene, which cannot otherwiſe be tranſlated than by Before, But in this it is ל Le, which may be tranſlated ſeveral ways, and eſpecially by In; ſo you read Lerouach (43), in the cool of the evening; Lekiſſe (44), in the throne, and ſuch like expreſſions (45). Beſides, the Vulgate has in porticu, and the Septuagint do not much differ as to the ſenſe: They tranſlate, he ſet up the pillars τῦ αἰλὰμ of the porch; which ſeems to imply, that the pillars were an appurtenance of the porch, and therefore very properly placed in it. Joſephus, as to this, ſays only (46), Solomon placed one of them on the right poſt of the porch, and the other on the left. The French and Engliſh tranſlations add, at the enterance of the porch. We have declared our opinion to be that they were within; but after all, if one likes them better without, we would not much oppoſe it, ſince ל may ſignify At, as where it is ſaid of Zebulun (47), "He ſhall ſtand "ל at the haven of the ſea; "or For, as in the very ſame expreſſion, viz, לאלם our own interpreters have taken it elſewhere (48), ſaying, for the porch.

(43) Gen iii. 8. (44) Pſalm ix. 4. (45) Pſalm xvi. 10. Dan. ii. 1. Hos v. 11. Zephan. ii. 15. (46) Antiq. lib. viii. c. 3. p. 344. (47) Gen. xlix. 13. (48) 1 Kings vii 12.

GOING

k GOING now out of the porch, we muſt take notice firſt of the Altar ſtanding before the porch [d], or before the houſe [e], as in the Hebrew, not improperly tranſlated the fore-front of the houſe: and there it ſeems to have ſtood in the middle of the court (S), of which court afterwards. This altar for burnt-offerings did anſwer to one of the ſame uſe in the tabernacle, whereof we have ſpoken at large [f]. What remains for us to obſerve is only the new altar, which was in length two cubits, and as many broad, beſides ten cubits high [g]; and ſince no ſteps were allowed in the tabernacle to go up to the altar [h], it ought to be ſuppoſed, there were none for that uſe in the temple, but only an eaſy aſcent up to the altar.

l OF the court itſelf we muſt own it is our opinion, that it went at firſt all about the temple. Thus was the court about the tabernacle an oblong ſquare, the length thereof being an hundred cubits, and the breadth fifty every where [i]. Now as we find no dimenſion given of the court in the temple, all we can well do, to go ſomewhat by a ſcriptural rule, is, to make this laſt court twice as big as that in the tabernacle, becauſe it ſufficiently appears king Solomon kept pretty near to that proportion in the building of the temple itſelf. Again, as in that oblong ſquare the tabernacle ſtood weſtwards, and that by that means the court had on the eaſt two third parts or more of the whole ſpace, we conceive the court in the temple, as Solomon at firſt built it, to have been much the ſame.

m BUT a wall is placed here on the weſt ſide of the court before the porch, for which no warrant will eaſily be found in that part of ſcripture that was to be our guide in our preſent enquiry, and therefore does not ſeem to be built upon any ſure foundation; but yet what we have to ſay for it may be ſeen in the next note (T).

A

[d] 1 Kings viii. 64 coll. 2 Chron. vii. 7. xv. 8. [e] Ibid xv. 8. [f] See before p. 285. [g] 2 Chron, iv. 1. [h] Exod xx. 26. [i] Ibid. xxvii. 9. 12.

(S) In the tabernacle, the altar of burnt-offerings was to be placed (49) before the door, and at a convenient diſtance *, ſo that our tranſlation ſeems to be very right in ſaying by (50) and at (51) it, which could not be well otherwiſe, the court being of a ſmall compaſs. But as that in the temple was much larger, the altar might here ſtand in the middle of the court; and this further appears from its relation to the King's Seat, which was in the midſt of the other court, and before this altar, as will be ſeen hereafter (52).

(T) By ſaying this we would not be underſtood wholly to deny there might be ſuch a wall in Solomon's time, for we read (53) con-

(49) Exod. xl. 6. * See before, p. 285. (50) Levit. i. 5. (51) Ibid. ver. 3. (52) Notes X. & Y. (53) 1 Kings vii. 12.

cerning

A new court is plainly mentioned in ſacred hiſtory. Thus n we read [l], That Jehoſhaphat ſtood in the congregation of Judah and Jeruſalem in the houſe of the Lord, before the new court (V). That here by the houſe of the Lord is underſtood the whole compaſs of the temple, with its ſeveral courts, wants no proof, after what has been ſaid above [m]. But what that new court is, we are now to conſider, Some will have it to have been the court of prieſts repaired, as indeed the altar was, by king Aſa [n], and therefore called the New Court.

o BUT though, by the analogy of the temple with the tabernacle, the court of prieſts ſeems to have been round about the holy and moſt holy place, and not divided by a wall; yet afterwards ſuch a wall being found convenient to be made between the altar and the porch, that part of the court about the temple becoming now a ſort of a court by itſelf, might be called the new court, the old name, viz. the court of the prieſts, remaining with that part where ſtood the altar. Now whether this will be judged a rational conjecture muſt be ſubmitted to the reader.

[l] 2 Chron. xx. 5. [m] Note C. & al. [n] 2 Chron. xv. 8.

cerning the houſe he built for his queen, The great court round about was with three rows of hewed ſtones, and a row of cedar-beams: As for the inner court of the houſe of the Lord, and for the porch of the houſe. Inſtead of As, our tranſlation renders Both, the Hebrew ו We, whoſe ordinary ſignification is and. But in the way of a compariſon, (as it plainly appears to be here uſed) if we conſult our tranſlation in other places (54), it would, we think, be more properly rendered by as. However, the wall for the porch of the houſe may, it ſeems, be underſtood of this wall that ſtood before the porch of the temple, though others, with ſome probability, underſtand it of a porch before the queen's houſe.

(V) The name given by the Septuagint to this court deſerves ſome attention: They call it αὐλὴν τῆς σκηνῆς the court of the tabernacle; which, well underſtood, ſeems to be a very proper name; for the houſe in Solomon's building did anſwer the tabernacle of Moſes, and here and there equally was the Shekinah, or inhabitation, of the divine majeſty, to which St. John alſo ſeems to have an eye, when he ſays, the λόγος word ἐσκήνωσεν ἐν ἡμῖν dwelt among us (55).

Now this ſituation of the New Court being allowed, we may, by it, further explain and fix the place where Zechariah, the high-prieſt's ſon, was killed. It is ſaid, this happened in the court of the houſe of the Lord between the temple and the altar (56), which muſt be as he came out of the temple, into this New Court, towards the wall before the porch.

(54) 1. Sam. xii. 15. Prov. x. 25. (55) John i. 14. (56) 2 Chron. xxiv. 20. Coll. Matt. xxiii. 35.

We

o We have a few words to add concerning the other, but undoubted, wall of the court of prieſts. It is ſaid [o], Solomon built the inner-court with three rows of hewed ſtone, and a row of cedar-beams. It is elſewhere [p] called the court of prieſts, and bore the name of the inner, becauſe of another round about it. But what theſe rows were, is not ſo eaſy to explain. Some indeed do not ſpare buildings that coſt them nothing, and of theſe rows make ſo many ſtories; but whether the ſingle Hebrew word, Tur, i. e. row, will uphold ſuch a heavy building, we very much doubt: To us there appears no more than a kind of parapet wall, of ſome four or five foot high, (conſiſting of three rows of ſtone, one upon another, and a fourth of cedar-beams over them) ſufficient to keep off the people from being an hinderance in the court of prieſts, but low enough for the Iſraelites without to ſee all the prieſts were doing within.

p One thing remains to be conſidered, which is the ſeveral entries into the court; for though we ſhould not find any mentioned, as they are ſufficiently [q]. they muſt, in the nature of things, have been there, and we therefore place them where we find it moſt proper, viz. over-againſt the gates that are ſaid to have been in that court where the people did meet for their ſolemn devotions.

q Now this court (X) was called the Great Court [r], becauſe of its bigneſs, comparatively to that of the prieſts, which was a good deal leſs; both of them being ſaid to be the two courts of the houſe of the Lord [s]. And that Solomon himſelf did build the one as well as the other, we read in theſe words, Furthermore he made the court of the prieſts, and the great court, and doors for the court, and overlaid the doors of them with braſs. Joſephus, not thinking this metal valuable enough, has made a tranſmutation of it into ſilver [t], and has, at no

[o] 1 Kings vi. 36. vii. 12. [p] 2 Chron. iv. 9. [q] Ibid. [r] Ibid. [s] 2 Kings xxi. 5. [t] Antiq. lib. viii. c. 3. p. 346.

(X) The Septuagint call it αυλην ιερᾶ, where ιερὸν ought not to be taken for becal commonly rendered, as has already been obſerved (57) by another Greek word, but never, as we know, by ιερὸν. This laſt word, as made uſe of both by them and Joſephus (58), does ſignify either the whole of the building, or ſome out-part of it, and is properly a ſacred place, or conſecrated ground; the court of Iſrael being its proper court, as it encompaſſed round about immediately that of the prieſts, and mediately the temple itſelf and oracle.

(57) 1 Chron. xxix. 4. Coll. Exod. xlv. 19. (58) Antiq. viii. c. 3. p. 346.

other expence than his fancy, built a large court upon a mount raiſed on purpoſe 400 cubits high. It is eaſy to preſume he has ſpared neither columns, nor porticoes, nor all the embelliſhments a fruitful imagination could prompt him to adorn it with (Y).

r. HASTE we now to fix the gates. There were three on three ſides of the temple, eaſt, north, and ſouth; beſides two on the weſt ſide. Theſe gates were kept by wardens, truſted with power and authority, who had under them numbers of Levites; for we read [u], Among theſe were the diviſions of the porters, even among the chief men, having wards one againſt another, to ſerve in the houſe of the Lord; and they caſt lots, as well the ſmall as the great, for every gate. We have nothing remarkable to ſay concerning the north and eaſt gates; but juſt by that to the ſouth, we find the houſe of Aſuppim [x], and what this houſe was is not eaſy to determine; however, as this belongs properly to our ſubject, we ſhall make our beſt endeavours towards a diſcovery that way.

s. THE radical verb Aſap ſignifies to add, aſſemble, or gather together, and the ſeveral nouns derived from it keep all this primitive ſenſe; ſo that it is to be preſumed, it it alſo preſerved in the word Aſuppim; but as this idea is indefinite, we muſt try to fix it by the uſe of this word, to be found only in the place already quoted, and a little lower [y], and in Nehemiah [z]. In the firſt quotation, the tranſlation is word for [u] 1 Chron. xxvi. 12, 13. [x] Ibid. ver. 15. [y] ver. 17.

[z] Chap. xii. ver. 25.

(Y) His words are, "Beyond this partition was another ſquare "court, (gr. ἱερὸν) or building, with large porticoes or galleries "about it, and four ſtately gates that opened eaſt, weſt, north, "and ſouth, the doors all plated and inlaid with gold. This place "was common to all the people.—The erecting of this outward "building was ſo ſtupendous an undertaking, that no tongue can "expreſs the difficulties of raiſing it, and a man would have much "ado to believe his own very eyes that ſaw it. Such hollows, "ſuch depths to be filled up, as a body could hardly have looked "upon, or but ſo much as fancied, without turning his brain; "400 cubits to be brought up to a level with the top of the moun-"tain, only to make the work regular and the ground even. This "port was encompaſſed again with a kind of double cloiſter, and "two rows of pillars to ſupport it, every pillar being cut whole "out of the rock; the doors were all ſilver work, &c.

word the houſe of Aſuppim, but the ſenſe ſeems rather (Z) to imply each of the two houſes, for ſo many there were under the direction of Obed-edom and his ſons. In the ſecond text the tranſlation ſays, toward Aſuppim two and two, (adding the word and, which is not in the Hebrew) and as far as can be judged, the true ſenſe is this, There were four Levites truſted with the care of the Aſuppim, two to the one, and two to the other. This ſeems to be confirmed by the third paſſage, that in Nehemiah; for one reads, according to the Hebrew, Porters keeping the ward at the Aſuppim of the gates. In the verſion it is at the threſholds, and in the margin treaſuries, or aſſemblies. It would have been better to have preſerved in the tranſlation the Hebrew word Aſuppim, which, though a proper name, is there a caſe governed. And if the three above-mentioned paſſages are carefully compared together, it will plainly appear, that there were, near the gate we have been ſpeaking of, two houſes, or diſtinct apartments, one on each ſide of this gate, where either the prieſts or the levites, or it may be both orders, aſſembled at times, either about buſineſs relating to the temple, or depoſited all things of uſe in that conſecrated place, ſince gathering and aſſembling are equally an apt tranſlation of the word Aſuppim. Beſides, we find in holy writ that there were ſuch apartments or houſes within the incloſure, or precinct of the temple, or its courts. So, for example, Jeremiah [a] brought the Rechabites into the houſe of the Lord, into one of the chambers, where he did put before them pots full of wine, and ſo on. This room, which, for that very reaſon, we may ſuppoſe to have had ſome extent, did belong to the offspring of Igdaliah, a man of God, that is to ſay, a prophet; and its ſituation is ſaid to have been next to the chamber of the princes, or chief men, which in the temple can be underſtood only of the prieſts, or chiefs of the levites. Beſides, it is ſaid that this chamber was above the chamber of Maaſeiah, the keeper of the door. It was an upper room. And it is well known, that about buſineſs of moment

[a] Chap. xxxv. 2, & ſeq.

(Z) According to an uſual way of ſpeaking in ſcripture; as where we read, The fool hath ſaid (59). How ſweet thy word (60). Let us lurk for the innocent (61). The wicked flee (62). She, that is, the woman, ſhall be ſaved (63). For, by what follows, the ſenſe appears to be each or either of the things and perſons mentioned. See above, letter o.

(59) Pſ. xiv. 1. (60) cxix. 103. (61) Prov. i. 11. (62) xxviii. 1. (63) 1 Tim. ii. 15.

they

they met in ſuch rooms among the Jews, which was ſtill a cuſtom in the time of the apoſtles [b]. Let that be as it will, there are ſeen here, in the ſame houſe, large rooms, different or diſtinct both in relation to the uſes they were put to, and the perſons that occupied them, whether they met or lodged in them, in order to be of ſervice to the temple, or its miniſters; or whether in particular the lower part or ground floor of theſe houſes, ſerved as ſtore-houſes, or treaſuries, which, it ſeems, may be gathered from what is related elſewhere [c], That Amaziah took all the gold, and the ſilver, and all the veſſels, that were found in the houſe of God with Obed-edom (A).

IT will be pertinent enough, before we go to the other gate, to put here together what we have more to ſay concerning the other apartments we have delineated in this court of the people. Upon which two things are very diſtinctly to be conſidered: the firſt relates to the form and particular ſituation of theſe apartments, and this we muſt frankly own we are ignorant of. But as it was abſolutely neceſſary to place them ſomewhere, we have diſpoſed of them, in the plaineſt manner we could, to the four corners of the temple, leaving to every one to fix and repreſent them as may be thought moſt proper. The ſecond thing we have to ſay about theſe chambers is concerning their real exiſtence, of which there is no room to doubt. For ſetting aſide what has juſt now been inſtanced of the Aſuppim, and apartments mentioned by Jeremiah; and ſuppoſing them to be different from thoſe we are now ſpeaking of, it is plain from holy writ [d], that David gave to Solomon the pattern of the courts of the houſe of the Lord, and of all the chambers round about, of the treaſuries of the houſe of God, and of the treaſuries of the dedicate things; and this order was executed, for [e] Ahijah was over the treaſures of the houſe of God, and over the treaſures of the dedicate things (B). To this it may be added, that in the temple of Zerubbabel, in Nehemiah's time, when to be ſure there had been no thoughts of exceeding Solomon's temple; Eliashib the priest having the oversight of the chamber, or rather of each chamber (C), of the house of God, had prepared for Tobiah, one allied unto him, a great chamber, where afore-time they laid the meat-offering, the frankincense, and the vessels, and the tithes of the corn, the new wine, and the oil, and the offerings in the courts of the house of God.

[b] Acts i. 13, & paſſ. [c] 2 Chron. xxv. 24. [d] 1 Chron. xxviii. 12. [e] Ibid. xxvi. 20.

(A) Not ſurely the ſame Obed-edom, who, from the foundation of the temple, had been chief warden of the Aſuppim, with his ſons under him, but one of his family, or poſterity, who now was in the ſame employment or office; either bearing the ſame name, or going by it in that his public capacity, or as ſucceſſor to him. Somewhat like we ſee in the names of Iſrael, Judah, David, &c.

(B) It may be not unworthy taking notice, that the ſame word אוצרות Oſroth, is equally in both texts, though it be differently tranſlated, viz. Treaſuries and Treaſures.

We would have these last words to be attended to; because these chambers should be carefully distinguished from those already mentioned [g], which immediately joined the temple. For besides that these last, as has been seen [h], were very small, and did not seem to have been capacious enough for those uses the others were put to, the difference of their names makes it probable, that these chambers were different. Those about the temple are called Jaziah (D), and those in the courts Leshacoth, and they were the chief porters that were over those chambers, or, as in the margin, store-houses and treasuries of the house of God [i]; and very large they ought to have been indeed, since in one of them, the chamber of Gemariah, in the higher court (E), which was that we are about, Baruc did [f] Nehem. xiii. 4, 5. [g] Supra lit. g. in marg. [h] Ibid.

[i] 1 Chron. ix. 26.

(C) According as has been observed above, though it may be the four Hebrew characters there, לשכת, are not rightly punctuated for Lischath, in the singular, a chamber, but ought to have been so for Leshacoth, in the plural, chambers. Yet, one way or other, the sense is much the same.

(D) יציע we take to have been somewhat like the Italian corridore, which some derive from currere, where one may run in, round about an house, as you have some furnished with bed-rooms in our hospitals and colleges. And truly the Hebrew word comes up to that notion, for יצע, jazab, is to lay, and יצוע, jazuab, a bed, Psal. 132, 139. However, in the jaziab, belonging to the temple, the rooms were of a smaller sort, but לשכות, Leshacoth, the larger sort of them, like our dining-rooms, parlours, or halls. And indeed in that emblematical temple of Ezekiel, where all is represented, in the height of grandeur and bigness, far above that of Solomon's temple, there is no mention of any such thing as jaziab, but, in its stead, so many Leshacoth. Yet it may be objected, that David gave to Solomon the pattern of the court of the house of the Lord, and of all the chambers, Leshacoth, round about (64). True they were such rooms, but not joining to the house, as the jaziabs which Solomon built against it (65).

(E) This is an expression that occurs but once, and is therefore the harder to be understood, though of itself a plain one, which seems did read the words of Jeremiah in the ears of all the people [k], which cannot well be underſtood but of a conſiderable number there met together (F).

(64) 1 Chron. xxviii. 12. (65) 1 Kings vi. 5, 10.

LET us now conſider the gates to the weſt, which deſerve a particular attention. Thus ſays the ſacred hiſtorian [l], To Shuppim and Hoſa the lot came forth weſtward with the gate Shallecheth, by the cauſey of the going up, ward againſt ward, and [m] at Parbar weſtward, four at the cauſey, two at Parbar. As to the firſt at ſouth-weſt, the name may be applied, according to its etymology, to what comes out like a projecture, as we call it from the Latin, or a jutting or leaning out in a building. The word is found only in two places of ſcripture, this of Chronicles, and another [n] where it is ſaid of oaks, whoſe ſubſtance is in them when they caſt their leaves, ſays our verſion, but the Hebrew be-ſhallecheth, where the particle be ſtands for in, and Shallecheth, we ſhould think to be, what is riſen, or above ground, for here ſuch trees very well ſtand or ſubſiſt (G).

HOWEVER, when the name of Shallecheth is given to the gate we are ſpeaking of, we ſee it at the ſame time joined to a cauſey. This was a jettee, bank, terraſs, or bridge, that led up to the temple. And here, it ſeems, ſhould be placed the miſhad, made for the temple by the king [o]. The tranſlation calls it pillars in the text, but in the margin rails (Heb. a prop), and in another place it bears the name of [p] Meſilloth, rendered by terriſes in the text, but in the margin ſtays (Heb. highways), the ſenſe of all which comes to one; for the ground without the temple ſeems to have been very uneven, and in ſeems to be in relation to a court that ſtood lower. But it may be no more is intended than thereby to ſignify the great court. However, if higher muſt be taken in the proper ſenſe, to us it appears, it is the new court that is here called the higher, becauſe thereon was the temple, in the eaſt of the hill, where, it is commonly ſuppoſed, was its top.

[k] Jerem. xxxvi. 10. [l] 1 Chron. xxvi. 16. [m] Ibid. ver. 18.
[n] Iſaiah vi. 13. [o] 1 Kings x. 12. [p] 2 Chron. ix. 11.

(F) It may be ſaid indeed, he might read it out of a window or balcony, which we are not willing to oppoſe; but then we do further remark, that this chamber, out of which he read, was at the entry of the new gate, ſuppoſed to be the eaſtern, and near it, in either court, might be large apartments.

(G) This, to us, appears to be the true notion the Hebrew text gives of what we have ſeen rendered by the word Subſtance, which is מצבת Matzebeth, the ſubſiſtence, properly, or ſubſiſting of a thing, wherefore it ſignifies a pillar and monument, Gen. xxxv. 14 20.

order

order to make the coming to it not only commodious, but delightful, Solomon contrived an avenue over the valley, one end of which answered the gate Shallecheth, and the other the palace, over-against the south side of the temple, to the north of mount Sion. It is in this disposal or order we are to consider what is called [q] his ascent, by which he went up into the house of the Lord; which ascent was built by Solomon in so costly a manner, that it was looked upon with admiration by the queen of Sheba. Thus have we assigned a cause why this gate should be called Shallecheth; and as there was the greatest concourse of those about court, and in general from the high city, here were two distinct guard-houses, parallel to one another, one under Shuppim, and the other under his co-partner Hosa.

x. BUT the second to the west, towards the north of the temple, was for the inhabitants of that part of the city that has since been called the lower; and this gate was called Parbar (H), the way from it leading to the suburbs named in sacred history Parvarim [r], from which this gate seems to derive its name, but slightly altered, the b and v consonant being capable of permutation, as is easy to be seen in most languages, both antient and modern. Now as the temple might be more exposed on that side than any where else, and there was a very great concourse of people, the out-let of the road near the gate was guarded by four Levites, and the gate itself by two more. But now let us return to the temple by the terrass-gate.

y. HERE we find the covert for the sabbath, and the king's entry adjoining to it; for we read in sacred history [s], that king Ahaz cut off the borders of the bases, and removed the laver from off them, and took down the sea from off the brazen oxen that were under it, and put it upon a pavement of stones: and the covert for the sabbath that they had built in the house, and the king's entry without, turned he from the house of the Lord, for the king of Assyria. We presume somewhat of a commentary on this passage, as to the two things here mentioned, will not be unacceptable to the reader.

WE must first form to ourselves an idea of this covert, called in Hebrew Misac, or, as the Masorites read it, Musac;

[q] 2 Kings ubi supr. ver. 5. [r] 2 Kings xxiii. 11. [s] 2 Kings xvi. 18.

(H) Which word the Targum does expound by that of בראּ, bara, i. e. without; and this sense of it seems very probable, since Parbar had its issue, or out-let, into the then out-parts of Jerusalem.

which

which pronunciation is not of great concern, for this word is to be found only in this place, the ſignification of which it is no eaſy matter to aſcertain. Sacab is to cover, and Maſac a covering or veil. As for the thing itſelf, we muſt look for what may relate to it among thoſe things built by Solomon in the temple. At the time of its dedication one finds [t], he had made a brazen ſcaffold, (in Hebrew it is Kior) of five cubits long, and five cubits broad, and three cubits high, and had ſet it in the midſt of the court, and upon it he ſtood, and ſo on. Here it is eaſy to imagine a raiſed up place, where ſtood the king. It might be in the ſhape of a hemiſphere, or hollow veſſel, almoſt like the concha, or triumphal car of the Romans; but whatever might be this Kior, it muſt of neceſſity have reſted upon, or been ſupported by a pedeſtal or column. This the Vulgate, following the Septuagint, expreſſes by the word baſe, inſtead of the Hebrew Kior. Much the ſame figure therefore would have been made uſe of, both in the text and tranſlations, where the whole takes its denomination from a part of the throne. We ſhall try to diſtinguiſh every one of them that made up this royal ſeat.

Firſt, We take notice of the baſe or column; for it is ſaid of Joaſh, when he was proclaimed king [u], He ſtood upon the pillar: this is the true meaning of the Hebrew [x], the ſame turn of expreſſion already made uſe of in relation to Solomon, although in the tranſlation it is by a pillar; and, what is very remarkable, the text adds Cammiſhphath, according to the manner, that is, as the kings were uſed to do in the temple, in their uſual place or throne. According to this, Joſiah, in order to renew the covenant [y], ſtood upon the pillar, according to the text; and this ſame pillar the king ſtood upon is, even in our tranſlation [z], called his place wherein he ſtood. It is plain to be ſeen, this place was very fit and proper for the king, who appeared there at the head of the Iſraelites, in their court, in the midſt of which the ſacred hiſtorian has fixed the throne [a] before the altar [b]. But it will not be amiſs to obſerve, that the king did not ſtand or ſit there, when he came to the temple in the form of an humble ſupplicant to the God of Iſrael, or to aſk his counſel; for in this caſe, it ſeems, the kings were mixed and confounded among the crowd of their ſubjects. At leaſt it is ſaid of Hezekiah [c], after he had received the threatning letter of the Aſſyrian king, He went up into the houſe of the Lord, and ſpread it before the Lord, and pray-

[t] 2 Chron. vi. 13.
[u] 2 Kings xi. 14.
[x] עמד אל עמוד Homed al-hamoud.
[y] 2 Kings xxiii. 3.
[z] 2 Chron. xxxiv. 31.
[a] Ibid. vi. 13.
[b] Ubi ſup. ver. 12.
[c] 2 Kings xix. 14.

ed,

ed, &c. where no mention is made of his standing upon the pillar. And we are the more apt to judge he did not, for that Jehoshaphat before him [d], when, in fear of the Moabites and Ammonites, he had proclaimed a fast, stood in the congregation of Judah and Jerusalem, in the house of the Lord, before the new court, and there prayed. There the king would not appear upon his throne, but went as near to the temple as he well could, which in our opinion, is intimated by his standing before the new court; for we have seen this court was immediately next to the temple, whereas the court of the priests, properly so called, before which stood the throne, was farther off. However, the throne was the ordinary seat upon all solemn occasions, when the king appeared before the altar. And there also it was young Joash was seated, in all the pomp of a king, at his inauguration. So the historian says [e], The king stood upon his pillar at the entering in, and the princes and the trumpets, &c. Our translation here again is stood at his pillar, but we do not choose to vary where the text is uniform.

Secondly, Upon this pillar was a sort of alcove, or small gallery, made, as we have hinted above, much in the same shape as our pulpits. This rested on the central point of its convex side upon the pillar: There the king might either sit or stand, and turn himself about to the temple, altar, or consecration, as he had occasion, as is observed of Solomon at the consecration of the temple [f].

Thirdly, The Kior seems to have been covered, as is at present the throne of our kings; and for this reason it was called Musac, which may be explained by canopy or cloth of state, this third part denominating the two first.

But it is not easy to conceive for what reason, to the idea of covering is joined that of Sabbath. The word Sabbath properly is rest, and figuratively the solemn day on which one did rest. If you take it in the first sense, it must only be understood, that the Musac covered the place where the king rested, or sat down (I), every one else standing [g]: if you take it in the second sense, it may imply that the Kior, or throne, was covered with the Musac, or cloth of state, only on the [d] 2 Chron. xx. 5. [e] Ibid. xxiii. 13. [f] 1 Kings viii. 14. 2 Chron. vi. 3, 12, 13. [g] Ubi sup. ver. 3.

(I) The seventy interpreters seem to have taken it in this sense. For they translate the covert of the sabbath by τὸ θεμέλιον τῆς καθίδρας, the foundation of the chair or seat.

last

aſt day of the week, the day of reſt or ſabbath; and then it was laid up till the next ſabbath-day, unleſs ſome high feſtival intervened that required the king's preſence in the temple.

IT may give ſome air of probability to this ſecond conjecture to take notice, that the Muſac was ſurely a very rich and valuable piece of work, ſince Abaz made uſe of it with a deſign to glut the avarice of the king of Aſſyria, whom he had very imprudently called to his aid againſt the king of Damaſcus [h].

IT will now be proper to ſhew the agreement between what we have been ſpeaking of, and the King's entry without. In order to do this, it will be needful to conſider what is written in the New Teſtament concerning Solomon's Porch: Chriſt uſed to walk then in the temple [i], the apoſtles were all with one accord there alſo [k], and all the people ran together unto them in the porch that is called Solomon's [l]. Now that this king had built ſuch a porch Joſephus acknowledges [m], but placeth it eaſtward, which ſeems to be an error, unleſs he meant that it went up eaſtward, which is true in our opinion. However, the authority of St. Luke and St. John is ſufficient to make us conclude, that among the ſeveral porticoes the temple was adorned with in their time, one in particular was looked upon as Solomon's. A ſure ſign that it was ſuppoſed he had built one, which ſufficeth for our purpoſe.

WE ſhall not here undertake to deſcribe exactly the ſtructure, nor even the ſituation, of that built by Solomon. It only appears in general, that it might reach or extend itſelf from the gate, where ended the terraſs by which the king went up from his palace, to the temple, and that it was carried forwards in a ſtrait line as far as over-againſt the Muſac; but then to go to the Muſac joining to the wall of the court of prieſts, one muſt turn to the left, and that turning will preciſely be the Mebo, or King's entry. It is to be ſuppoſed, the porch from the gate Shallecheth, as far as this entry, might be a common paſſage for the uſe of the public as well as of the king; but from the turning to the throne, as has already been obſerved, it was the king's entry properly ſo called; which conſequently was adorned and inriched much more magnificently than the reſt. For which reaſon Abaz made uſe of it, as well as of the covert of the ſabbath, to buy the aſſiſtance of the king of Aſſyria. Not that we are to think, that Abaz deſtroyed the whole building, which was not neceſ-sary; but, as we read of Hezekiah [n], that he cut off the gold from the doors of the temple of the Lord, and from the pillars which he had over-laid, and gave it to the king of Assyria; now the same did Ahaz, taking away a portion out of the house of the Lord [o], viz. The king's entry and covert for the sabbath, just as Hezekiah did the rest abovesaid.

[h] 2 Kings xvi. 7. [i] John x. 23. [k] Acts v. 12. [l] Ibid. [m] Antiq. lib. xx. c. 8. p. 899, & B. I. lib. v. c. 5. p. 1225.

BUT what may be of more weight in this enquiry is, that this hypothesis of the situation of the Musac, or royal throne, will clear up a circumstance in Joash's inauguration, otherwise very difficult to be understood [p]. It is well known, that that prince, by Jehoiada's means, having been proclaimed in the temple, the noise was heard by Athaliah in her palace; upon which she in haste ran to the temple by the terrass-walk, which for her was the readiest and shortest way (K). She went in at the gate Shallecheth, and crossed what we have called the portico, or porch of Solomon, at least that part of the court, where stood in arms the Levites, according to the directions of the high-priest [q]. They, seeing the queen, but having no particular orders concerning her, did let her advance, so that she drew nearer; and coming as far as the King's entry, or directly over-against it, it is said [r], She looked, and behold the [n] 2 Kings xviii. 16. [o] 2 Chron. xxviii. 21. [p] 2 Kings xi.—2 Chron. xxiii. [q] Kings ubi sup. ver. 5. 11. [r] Ibid. 14.

(K) We confess no place of scripture gives the situation of this palace, so as to fix it exactly. However, it is probable the ground it stood upon was called the middle city, as we have it in the margin of our translation, though in the text, middle court (66). The truth of which is, what is written in the Hebrew, called ketib, is הָעִיר habir, the city; but what is read according to the Masorites, called keri, is חָצֵר hazer, or chazer, a court. Now supposing, as is likely, the true reading to be habir, this shews where the palace stood; for nothing could well be called the middle city, but what had westward the top of mount Sion, whereon was built the higher city, or city of David. And then at the foot of this mount, on a plain, or level surface to the east, you meet with the palace of Solomon, though not in a low place; for to the north, a large valley lay betwixt it and the temple, standing itself upon that other hillock called Moriah. Further it does appear (67), the palace stood in the eastern part of Jerusalem, where was the court of the prison, the water-gate, and the horse-gate that led to the palace, whose front looked up to the temple, both places having an easy communication by the celebrated terrass, or ascent, of which before.

(66) 2 Kings xx. 4. (67) Nehem. iii. 25.—28. Conf. 2 Kings xi. 16. & 2 Chron. xxiii. 15.

king

king ſtood upon his pillar at [r] the entering in, and the princes and the trumpets by the king.-- Then Athaliah rent her cloaths, and ſaid, Treaſon! Treaſon! Hereupon the high-prieſt, Jehoiada, ordered the commanding officers to have her forth of the ranges [t]; which, according as their armed Levites were poſted, could not more conveniently and with greater ſurety be done, than in opening the ranks towards the gate of Aſuppim, which was over-againſt the king's entry to the ſouth (L). By this gate then Athaliah was thruſt out of the temple immediately, and the better to hinder her from returning to her palace, they conducted her towards the fields, through the eaſtern gate of Jeruſalem, called Miphkad, or priſon gate [u], then turning to the right by the corner [x], down to the horſe gate [y], eaſtward of the palace, thereabouts ſhe was killed. Soon after the high-prieſt brought the king from the temple to the palace by the way of the gate of the guard (M), and thence through the great or high gate of that palace [z]. This we reckon is the [r] Chron. ubi ſup. ver. 13. [t] Kings ubi ſup. 15, & Chron. ubi ſup. 14. [u] Nehem. iii. 31. xii. 3. 9. [x] Jerem. xxxi 40. [y] 2 Kings xi. 16. 2 Chron. xxiii. 15. Nehem. iii. 28. [z] 2 Chron. xxiii. 20.

(L) Being divided in three parts, the Levites had three different poſts joining to one another (68); one third part was to guard the King's houſe, or apartment, next to the temple, ſouthward; another to be at the gate of Sur, or turning, which ſeems to be that of Aſuppim, whereat the king turned to his throne. It is indeed called by another name, but very like it in the Hebrew, viz. the gate of Sippim, where our verſion has doors or threſholds. The laſt was at the gate beyond the guard, or runners (69), which ſeems to be that of Shallecheth. For the king coming to the temple through this gate, any one may ſee that there was their proper ſtation in the avenue. It is alſo called the gate of foundation, becauſe of the preſture there made with the terraſs, as has been obſerved.

(M) So ſays the firſt of the ſacred hiſtorians (70), meaning as we take it, the gate that before has been called the gate beyond the guard, viz. Shallecheth, or ſouth-weſtern gate. But if one had rather, that the gate of the guard here, which is ſomewhat different from the other, ſhould ſignify the ſame with the high gate in Chronicles, where the guard of the king's houſe ſtood; this will make no variation in the main; for as it is rightly ſuppoſed to have been in the front of the palace, it was the firſt gate they met with coming from the LORD'S to the King's houſe over the terraſs, or aſcent.

(68) See 2 Kings xi. 5, &c. 2 Chron. xxiii. 4, &c. (69) See of them, 2. Sam. xv. 1. 1 Kings i. 5. xiv. 27. (70) 2 Kings xi. 19.

true ſenſe; though ſome would underſtand by this high gate, a gate of the temple; but there was no ſuch gate in the temple till the reign of Jotham, of whom it is ſaid in expreſs terms* He built the high gate of the houſe of the Lord; which is generally taken to be that towards the eaſt (N). But let this ſuffice, poſſibly have we launched out too far, and ventured upon too many conjectures; but we hope the reader will do us the juſtice to acknowledge we have kept our word, in carefully diſtinguiſhing between probable opinions and things of greater certainty.

I beg leave to conclude the whole with one remark. It is allowed, that the main ſcope of the ſacred writings was not ſo much to ſatisfy our vain curioſity, as to inſpire us with the love of all chriſtian virtues; and therefore, though we may juſtly expect that every thing which relates to this latter, which is the eſſential of religion, ſhould be delivered with all poſſible clearneſs, it would be abſurd to expect the ſame ſatisfaction about the former. Thoſe leſs important points, many of which are well worth enquiring after, make a branch of chriſtian philology, in which every man, being forced to ſupply the want of evidence with probable conjectures, is intitled to differ from others, whenever he thinks his own better grounded. But though in points like this, I have been upon, it be almoſt lawful to err, yet thoſe are more excuſable who keep a conſtant regard to the ſacred original above all things, than thoſe who manifeſtly depart from it, to follow their own fancies, or the fabulous accounts of the Jews. Now, as I have drawn the greateſt part of my light from the former, I am ſenſible, that thoſe who have been converſant with all the pompous deſcriptions we have extant, will be ſurprized to find this of mine come ſo vaſtly ſhort of the boaſted magnificence of that ſacred building. But here I deſire it may be remembered, that as this was deſigned to contain no more than could be met with, or fairly deduced from the ſacred writings, ſo the reader will at leaſt reap this benefit from it, that he will now be better able to judge what is, or is not authentic in other plans of this ſtructure, than he could have been without it.

* 2 Kings xv. 35. & 2. Chron. xxvii. 3.

(N) This we do remark, becauſe Ezekiel (71) ſpeaks of the higher gate that lieth toward the north, the ſame, it ſeems, with that which Jeremy (72) calls the high gate of Benjamin, which was בביתן bebeth, in or by the houſe of the LORD.

(71) Cap. ix. 2. (72) Cap. xx. 2.

A Deſcription

A Deſcription of JERUSALEM.

AFTER the account we have given of the holy city's greateſt ornament, the temple of SOLOMON, we have thought it would not be unacceptable, for a more comprehenſive view of the whole, to ſubjoin a deſcription of the city itſelf, according to the ſacred hiſtorians.

IT is a general ſuppoſition, though, as we preſume, without any ſolid argument to ſupport it, that Melchiſedek's Salem ſtood in the ſame place, where afterwards was built the city, the ſubject of our preſent enquiry (A). We will not, at this time, undertake to decide the queſtion, but ſhall only take notice of the habitations of the Canaanites, who dwelt here and in the adjacent parts, being called Jebus and Jebuſi [a]. David having taken from them the mountain, upon the top of which was their ſtrong hold, made it his place of reſidence [b], and this is commonly called Zion, or the city of David [c]. Under Solomon the name of Jeruſalem either firſt began, or firſt got the better of the other; but there being no ſure reaſon aſſigned for this, nor any determined ſignification affixed to the name (B), we will dwell no longer upon theſe

Its Origin and names.

[a] Joſh. xv. 8. xviii. 28. [b] 2 Sam. v. 7. 9. [c] Pſ. xlviii. & paſſ. 1 Chron. xi. 5.

(A) What is generally alledged, that the tabernacle was in Salem (1), proves only that it was the ſhortened or abridged name of that city, like that of Solyma. Some even have ſaid Solymus for Hieroſolymitanus (2).

Solymo nigrantem pulvere fratrem.

(B) ירושלים, according to the pronunciation of the Maſorites, Jeruſhalaim; but to that of the Chaldee, in holy writ, Jeruſhelem; which is much the ſame as the Greek ἱερουσαλὴμ, and our Jeruſalem. This word, in all likelihood, is compounded and derived from Shalem, or Shalum, peace; and, as ſeveral are of opinion, from jarab, to fear; or raah, to ſee; or jaraſh, to inherit or poſſeſs; or from Jerus, altered from Jebus, by a mutation of letters. We read in Joſephus (3), that by ſome it was thought Homer had called this city Solyma; and that truly the Temple was called, in Hebrew, Solyma, i. e. ſafety, or ſecurity. St. Jerom lays this to the Jewiſh hiſtorian's charge in very hard words (4); and, as it ſeems, with ſome juſt ground.

(1) Pſ. lxxvi. 2. (2) Valer. Flav. lib. 1. Argonaut. (3) Ant. vii. p. 287. (4) Quod abſurdum eſſe peregrinæ linguæ mixturæ demonſtrat. De Loc Hebr.

For,

theſe uncertainties, but enter into the matter in hand, by conſidering Jeruſalem.

Holineſs. IN regard to its holineſs. We muſt not imagine this attribute has been given to it by the rabbies only, or by the legend of the ſhekels, which is Jeruſalem the holy [d]. Iſaiah [e] tells us, that the Iſraelites call themſelves of the holy city. Nehemiah twice qualifies it by that title [f], all which doth ſufficiently ſhew it was generally called ſo. In the new teſtament [g] the ſame title is ſeveral times given to it. Beſides, it is well known that in the Pſalms it bears the name of City of God [h]; in the Prophets [i] we read, that it ſhall be called the Throne of the Lord; our Saviour himſelf calls it the City of the great king [k]; as being hallowed and conſecrated in a particular manner by God's reſidence in the temple. The rabbies [l] add, that there was a penalty forbidding the leaving a dead corpſe in it the ſpace of a night, and that the importation of dead mens bones was unlawful; notwithſtanding this, in it were contained the Tombs of the royal family [m]. It is further added by the rabbies, that within its walls were not to be ſeen gardens, trees, dung, or lime-kilns, or even cocks. In it no houſes were to be let; and this, I think, means only that the inhabitants were obliged to exerciſe hoſpitality by entertaining their brethren, on whom it was incumbent to reſort from all parts to Jeruſalem on the days of the great Feſtivals (C).

[d] ירושלם הקדושה See before p. 410. [e] Iſ. xlviii. 2.
[f] Nehem. xi. 1. 18. [g] Matth. iv. 5, & paſſ. [h] Pſ. xlvi. 4.
[i] Jerem. iii. 17. coll. Dan. xi. 45. Joel. iii. 17. Zech. viii. 3.
[k] Matth. v. 35. coll. Pſ. xlviii 2. [l] In Gemara Bava Kama & libro Siphra ap. RELAND. [m] Vid. JOSEPH. Ant. vii. p. 331. ſin. conf. Nehem. iii. 16.

For, in another place, the ſame hiſtorian (5) tells us, that Melchiſideck was the firſt that built the temple, τὸ ἱερὸν; and that after he had built it, he called it ἱεροσόλυμα, which was before named σόλυμα: where that ſtrange etymology is again ſeen; not to mention other groſs errors, which give us room to think this paſſage is very much falſified (6). This may have happened to ſeveral others, which it is to be hoped, will be reſtored by Mr. Whiſton, in the tranſlation he intends to publiſh.

(C) Of this ſome have thought an intimation ſeems to be given in the goſpel (7), where Chriſt will have a room made ready for him to eat the paſſover.

(5) Bell. Jud vi. p. 1292 (6) Conf. above temple, p. 561. not. A. (7) Matth. xxvi. 17.

It

IT is no eaſy matter preciſely to determine the extent of this city in its different changes. Its moſt antient ſtate of perfection was under the flouriſhing reign of its founder's ſucceſſor, I mean Solomon; in whoſe time this city, before embelliſhed by his father David, appeared in its greateſt luſtre and beauty, and there is no great likelihood, that it was enlarged by thoſe that came after him. The general and indeterminate deſcriptions, to be found in the authors of thoſe times, will not permit us, as we have juſt now hinted, to ſettle with any exactneſs the bounds of it. We will however venture to ſuppoſe its circumference, at firſt to have been about ſeven or eight Stadia, or a Roman mile. It was certainly twice, or probably three times, as large under Solomon. After the Captivity, this city being rebuilt, took up much the ſame ſpace as before; as may be gathered from Nehemiah's [n] deſcription of the ruins of the city, and its condition after it was repaired. This deſcription of Nehemiah we ſhall take particular notice of, and at the ſame time ſhall not let that of Joſephus [o] paſs unheeded. According to this hiſtorian, the whole circumference of Jeruſalem was 33 Stadia [p], which is about four miles and 125 paces. But Hecateus, who has deſcribed it ſuch as it was in his time, under Ptolemy Lagus [q], gives it nd leſs than 50 Stadia *, probably including the outparts, which properly did not belong to it; for there is no reaſon to believe, that there was any conſiderable decreaſe, from the time of Hecateus to that of Joſephus, ſo that we muſt ſtand to the meaſure of the laſt of theſe: we will only add, that Hecateus's aſſertion, that there was in Jeruſalem one hundred and twenty thouſand inhabitants, is very probable (D).

[n] Chap. ii, iii. & xii. [o] Bell. Jud. vi. 4. cui tit. Ἱεροσόλυμων ἐκφρασις, p. 1221. [p] Ibid. p. 1223. N°. iii. [q] DIODOR. SICULUS lib. i. * Apud JOSEPH. C. APION. p. 1348.

(D) His words are, ὧν ἐκείσε μὲν ἄνθρωποι περὶ δώδεκα μυριάδες, twelve myriads; now a myriad is 10,000; and 120,000 inhabitants may ſeem rather too few for ſuch an extent as had Jeruſalem of four miles. We ſee that in the ſiege periſhed, according to Joſephus (8), 1,100,000 men, μυριάδες ἑπτὰ καὶ δέκα, beſides 97,000 taken priſoners during the war; and that this may gain more credit Joſephus adds, as an undoubted proof, that in Ceſtius's enrollment on Eaſter-day were reckoned 255,600 lambs. Now there was not leſs than ten men to each lamb; ſo that the number of thoſe that were purified according to the law, beſides the reſt, muſt have been two millions, five hundred and fifty ſix thouſand.

(8) De Bell. Jud. lib. ult. p. 1291.

THE

Situation. THE situation of this capital city of Judæa has always been extremely advantageous. The agreeable variety of rising grounds with which it was encompassed [r], the fruitful meadows that lay between, interspersed with clear rivulets and wholesome streams [s]; the hills on which it stood, which rose gradually one behind another, and looked like a natural Amphitheatre, made up as pleasing and delightful a prospect as can well be conceived.

OF these hills the two largest, Zion and Acra, were directly opposite to each other; on Moriah, whose compass might be about three quarters of a mile, Solomon built the temple. Of the two first we will take a more distinct view, beginning with mount Zion.

THIS hill, as has already been shewn [t], bounded to the south the whole circumference, and reached from west to east. The western side was highest, and bounded by the valley of Hinnom (E) as the eastern by that of Jehoshaphat [u], which it is thought, joined the other towards the south [w]. Here were several springs, particularly that of Gihon [x], or Shiloh [y], which ran very plentifully with exceeding good [r] ירושלם הרים סביב לה, Ps. cxxv. 2. [s] 2 Chron. xxxii. 3, 4. [t] See above temple, descript. p. 565. [u] Joel. iii. 2. [w] Kimchi in loc. [x] 1 Kings i. 33. 2 Chron. xxxii. 30. [y] Isai. viii. 6. John ix. 7.

(E) גיאהנם Ge-hinnom, so it is called (9) in Joshua, where Hinnom is a man's name. In another place (10) it is the valley of the sons, or children of Hinnom; and it is said, that in this valley was Topheth, where the children were made to pass through the fire in honour to Moloch. Upon this account, it is thought this place took its name from the tears the children shed whilst burning, and from the noise of the drums which were kept beating, in order to drown their shrieks. But the text in Joshua shews, that the valley did bear this name long before it was put to such an use, if ever it was put to it at all. At least, if we believe Maimon, and other rabbies, the children were made to pass through the flame only, as being, by that ceremony, consecrated to the idol (11). However, in later times, the carrion was thrown into this valley (12); and when it did not waste away fast enough, frequently burnt. This has given room to fix upon the word Gehenna, (which represents in Greek and Latin the Hebrew word) the notion of hell-fire (13).

(9) Josh. xv. 8. (10) 2 Kings xxiii. 10. (11) Seld. de Diis Syris, Synt. i. cap. 6. (12) 2 Kings ubi sup. (13) Matth. v. 22, 29, & 30, pass.

water (F). To the north, Zion had another valley that lined it from one end to the other, named by Joſephus [z] the valley of the Cheeſemongers; probably the ſame as that diſtinguiſhed in Zephaniah [a] by the epithet of the Makteſh (G), tranſlated by the Septuagint τὴν κατακεκομμένην, that was cut into, or made hollow (H).

Acra (I), with the ſaid valley to the ſouth, ſtood to the north of Zion; its declivity was equal on every ſide, as Joſephus ſays; and we cannot give a better idea of theſe two hills, nor of the valley between them, than he who had ſo often ſeen them. According to this hiſtorian [c], Jeruſalem was built upon the two hills, Zion and Acra, directly oppoſite Acra. [b]

[z] Ubi ſup. in Ecphraſi. [a] Chap. i. ver. 11. [b] Ubi ſup. in Ecphraſi. [c] Ibid.

(F) Πηγὴν γλυκεῖαν τὶ καὶ πολλὴν are the words of Joſephus (18). Others have thought, that Shiloh was a rivulet of Gihon, and it is true that that word ſignifies ſent, according to the etymology given of it in the goſpel (19); where it is alſo called pool.

(G) Which word ſignifies a mortar, or any hollow thing. Thus the מִכְתֵּשׁ בְּלֶחִי, which ſo ſeaſonably refreſhed Samſon's thirſt, is univerſally rendered the hollow of the rock Lechi, ſo called from its reſemblance to a jaw-bone, or from the ſlaughter he had made with it there (20).

(H) In the ſame manner, 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, babbor, (in our tranſlation a pit, in which Benaiah, in time of ſnow, ſlew a lion) literally the pit, was probably a known place, ſo named from its cavity and hollowneſs, and may very well be the deep valley here mentioned. What ſeems to favour this conjecture is, that Benaiah was one of David's mighty men, or captains. Now it is very poſſible, that he being upon duty at the gate of the city of David on mount Zion, and hearing in the valley, at the foot of the palace, the roaring of a lion, whom want of food, in time of ſnow, had brought thither, deſirous of ſignalizing himſelf by ſo ſingular an action, immediately went down, encountered, and deſtroyed the hungry rapacious beaſt.

(I) This name ſeems to be borrowed from the Greek ἄκρα, an eminence; and ſometimes a citadel, or fortreſs (21). It is well known, that there was one built upon this hill by Antiochus, and afterwards laid even to the ground by Simon (22). And to this reaſon it muſt be aſcribed, that Acra has been ſince diſtinguiſhed by that name. Notwithſtanding the Targum (23) makes ſometimes uſe of this expreſſion, the Acra; that is, the Citadel of Zion.

(18) Bell. Jud. v. p. 1222. (19) John. ix. 7. (20) Judg. xv. 17, & ſeq. (21) 1 Maccab. i. 33. (22) See Joſeph. Antiq. xii. & xiii. (23) On 2 Sam. v. 7.

one to another, and ſeparated by the valley of the Cheeſe-mongers. The firſt was higher, and its length formed a much ſtraiter line than the ſecond. Upon it, that is Zion, ſtood the high city, in the author's time called the high market-place. The lower city ſtood upon Acra, but before that bore other names, as hath been already obſerved in the deſcription of the temple [d].

LET us now examine theſe mountains, in relation to their different wards or quarters, ſtreets, and public places, as well as palaces, and moſt remarkable buildings.

Wards. THE principal quarter was called the City of David [e], on the top of mount Zion, towards the weſt. This was a fortification which encloſed that king's palace; and it is likely that near this, afterwards, ſtood that of Herod, which ſerved as a citadel [f]. To the weſt of the fort was מִצְפָּה Mizpah, or Maſpah, according as the Hebrew word is differently pronounced; but this is not the knotty part of the queſtion: the difficulty would be to prove, that Mizpah was a part of Jeruſalem, it being ſure that near it was a ſmall town that bore that name [g]. Theſe are the words of Nehemiah [h], Shallun of Colhozeh, ruler of the פֶּלֶךְ Pelec of Mizpah, repaired the gate of the fountain. Now Pelec in Hebrew is a ſtaff [i], and ſo may ſignify a diſtrict, ward, or quarter, ſubject to a particular juriſdiction or inſpection, in the ſame manner as שֵׁבֶט Shebet, a rod, ſignifies a tribe. The Chaldee dialect makes uſe of Pelac, and פַּלְגָא Pileca, in the ſame ſenſe as is here given to Pelec. The Arabians give this name, which they pronounce Felec, to a ſphere; ſo that it would be a pretty good tranſlation of παροικία Pariſh, as it denotes the neighbourhood round about. The Septuagint tranſlate it here part, or portion; but every where elſe in this chapter it is a περίχωρος circumference of land, a diſtrict of more or leſs extent. The Latin word Vicus bears the ſame ſenſe, and is made uſe of in the Vulgate; though in this place, ſpeaking of Mizpah, that tranſlation has Pagus, and in another place Pars; ſo uncertain it is to truſt to tranſlations, how uſeful ſoever they may be when compared together. However, I ſhall venture to ſay that Mizpah was one of the quarters of Jeruſalem, and that it was divided into two parts; that we are ſpeaking of to the weſt, and the other, where ſtood the Arſenal, and where Ezer was ruler [k], to the eaſt of the forteſs.

[d] See deſcrip. tem. p. 566. [e] 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. Nehem. xii. 37. [f] Bell Jud. p. 1230. [g] Jerem. xl. 10. [h] Nehem. iii. 15. [i] 2 Sam. iii. 29. [k] Nehem. iii. 19.

ANOTHER

ANOTHER quarter, divided into two parts, bears the name of Jeruſalem [l], which had two rulers, each of half a quarter. This is the part which Joſephus [m] calls the City, with reſpect to the citadel, and both together made the upper city. There were three other quarters, which, it ſeems, might be looked for in Acra, viz, Bethakerem, Bethzur, and Keilah.

As for the Streets, in Hebrew רחובות Hhouzoth [n], all we know concerning thoſe of Jeruſalem, at that time, is, that as there was one bearing the name of Haophim, i. e. Baker's-ſtreet [o]; ſo there might be others which bore the names of ſome other trades; thus the valley, in Joſephus's time, was called Tyropeon [p]. Streets.

רחוב Rehob properly is an open place (K); in the Rehoboth, according to Ezekiel [q], were built the high places. In the book of Eſther [r], an officer of the king of Perſia goes out to Mordecai in the Rehob of the town, over-againſt the gate of the palace, which ſeems to have been made uſe of by the courtiers to walk in. In the Rehob of Jeruſalem [s] Hezekiah aſſembled his generals, and made a ſpeech to them. The people were gathered together by Ezra [t] in a Rehob of the temple, and the prieſts and levites by Hezekiah [u] in the eaſtern Rehob; we muſt ſuppoſe theſe two to have been parts of the vacant ſpace that ſurrounded the courts of the temple. Laſtly, there was a Rehob near the water-gate [w], which muſt have been vaſtly large, ſince it contained all the people of both ſexes that flocked thither from all parts, in order to hear Ezra read the law, upon a ſcaffold, or ſtage, erected upon this occaſion at one end of the place, in ſuch a manner that Ezra had the whole aſſembly facing him. Places.

IF we have not yet taken notice of מלוא Millo, it is becauſe we do not find it in ſcripture diſtinguiſhed by any of the above-mentioned names, or indeed by any other name than Millo. When David took from the Jebuſites the top of mount Zion, he then built round about from Millo and inwards, ſays the text of Samuel [x]; where it is eaſy to under-

[l] Ibid. 9, & 12. [m] Antiq. xiv. p. 613. [n] Prov. vii. 12. [o] Jerem. xxxvii. 21. [p] See before p. 593. [q] Ezek. xvi. 24. [r] Eſther iv. 6. [s] 2 Chron. xxxii. 6. [t] Ezra x. 9. [u] 2 Chron. xxix. 4. [w] Nehem. viii. 1, 4. Add the Rehob of the gate Ephraim, ibid. 16. [x] 2 Sam v. 9. Coll. 1 Chron. xi. 8.

(K) The root רחב doth ſignify to enlarge itſelf; ſo that Rehob is literally a large place, and is made uſe of to ſignify the place, or ſquare, of a town, Judges xix. 15.

ſtand a caſtle was built on this mount, ſurrounded with ſtrong walls, and probably of a circular form. Now this building had on the eaſt what is called Millo, and on the other ſides was bounded by the hill itſelf; inſomuch, that the city of David was within mount Zion on the north, weſt, and ſouth, but was bordered eaſtwards by Millo (L). Although it is ſaid in the text[y] Solomon built it, yet the context ſhews, that he only made an end of it, or repaired it; and as much did Hezekiah in his time[z]. Who the firſt was that built it, we do not know; but it ſeems to have been a work of the Jebuſites, whoſe government was almoſt a Democracy, like that at Athens.

For this reaſon, and from what is ſaid in ſcripture, there would be no abſurdity in ſuppoſing it to have been a ſpacious open place, ſuch as the Campus Martius at Rome; where the people met for their recreation, on feſtival and other rejoicing days, or about private or public affairs. It may be placed at the foot of the city of David, going to the valley between Zion and Acra, in the centre of the whole circumference of Jeruſalem. Others imagine it to be a Street, beginning at the ſteps of the city of David, and reaching as far as Acra, or

[y] Vid. 1 Kings ix. 15. 24. &. xi. 27. [z] 2 Chron. xxxii. 5.

(L) Without doubt Millo doth ſignify ſomething either full, or to be filled; at leaſt this may be deduced from the two Hebrew words that come neareſt to it Melo fulneſs, and Miluah bezel, or collet, in which are inchaſed precious ſtones. So Moſes, receiving orders about the breaſt plate, is bid to fill the bezel, Miluah, with a ſtone (24), that the ſtones ſhall be ſet in gold in their encloſings (25), and that they were incloſed in ouches of gold in their incloſings, bemilluotham (26). So then Millo was ſomething filled up; and this we are very ready to allow, for, to make it fit for the uſe we have been ſpeaking of, it was required, that in ſome places this ſpot of ground ſhould be made level, and in others filled up, in order to its being uniform and of a piece. This derivation ſurely favours our opinion more than any other; and we might add to this, that it is very likely this was the place where afterwards ſtood the Xyſtos (27), a large place where the athlets did exerciſe. And as ſuch a place was alſo called περίδρομος from the runnings there round about, it hath been apprehended an Hippodrome was there for horſe-races; which is not improbable. However, it very much reſembling what we have ſaid of Millo, it may alſo be, that the firſt inhabitants may have given it this name from its being a place of general concourſe, and ſo filled up with numbers of people of all ſorts.

(24) Exod. xxviii. 17. (25) Ibid. 21. (26) Ibid. xxxix. 13. (27) Joſ. in Ecphraſi 1222.

Moriah;

Moriah; or elſe a Wall along the valley between the two hills; and laſtly, the Valley itſelf. But this ſeems leſs probable than what we at firſt hinted.

LET us next viſit the public buildings in Zion: The firſt Buildings. that offers itſelf is the Palace of king David, on the top of the mount in the midſt of a fortreſs [a]. There was a flight of ſteps to go up to it [b]; to the north of theſe ſteps, or ſtairs, ſtood the Tomb of David, of which Joſephus tells many wonderful ſtories at the end of the ſeventh book of his antiquities. At the bottom of the ſteps was the houſe of the Mighty [c]. This, in my opinion, ſerved as a guard-houſe to the palace, or at leaſt was the ſtation of ſome chief commanders, without whoſe leave no one was permitted to go up to the houſe; ſuch as we ſuppoſe the thirty one worthies [d], among which was Uriah the Hittite [e].

NEXT was the Arſenal, or Armoury, at the turning of the wall [f], in Hebrew called Mikzoah (M); but the Arſenal itſelf, by a compendious expreſſion, or way of ſpeaking, was called הַנֶּשֶׁק Hanneſhek, for Neſhek is a weapon, or arms. The word baith, a houſe, muſt therefore be underſtood.

NOT far from the Arſenal, and more towards the middle of the city was, if not the palace of the high-prieſt, at leaſt a pontifical palace, then in the poſſeſſion of Eliaſhib [g]. Nehemiah mentions it only occaſionally, when he ſpeaks of the repairs of the walls of the city; but even from the little that is ſaid of it, we may gather that it was a ſpacious building. Lower, at a very little diſtance, we find the houſe of Azariah, a man of diſtinction of the tribe of Benjamin *. But it is time to come to the Palace or Palaces.

And here the books of Kings do indeed mention three houſes built by Solomon; the firſt they call the houſe where he dwelt [h]; the ſecond, the houſe of the foreſt of Lebanon [i];

[a] 2 Sam. v. 11. [b] Nehem. iii. 15. [c] Ibid. 16. [d] 2 Sam. xxiii. 8. & ſeq. [e] Ibid. 39. [f] Nehem. iii. 19. [g] Ibid. 20. * Ibid. 23. [h] 1 Kings vii. 1. 8. [i] Ibid. 2.

(M) מִקְצֹעַ is properly the opening of an angle, which conſequently forms a ſpace; but פִּנָּה Pinah is the point of an angle, or, as it is called by artiſts, a ſalient angle; ſo the wall had a turning out here, and this juſtifies the tranſlation; and any one may ſee that it formed a corner, or open place, in the interior angle. For this reaſon, ſuch an opening in Ezekiel's temple is called Mikzoah; Behold, ſays he (28), in every מִקְצֹעַ corner of the court there was a court.

(28) Ezek. xlvi. 21.

and

and the third was, that which he made for Pharaoh's daughter [k]; but this laſt I take to have been only a ſpacious apartment (N) added to the firſt houſe, whoſe ſituation it is not very difficult to fix. For, on one ſide, this palace was almoſt parallel to the water-gate [l], and on the other, there was a communication between it and the temple, by means of the terras built by Solomon over the valley [m]. I am apt to think that the ſecond was a ſummer retirement, ſince we have it upon record that Solomon built it in the foreſt [n]. But yet I would not contradict thoſe who are of opinion, that it was only another wing, or apartment of the palace, which very probably took its name from the cedars of Lebanon, that may be ſuppoſed to have been the chief material employed in it.

THE following conſideration adds a great deal of weight to this ſide of the queſtion, viz. That in this houſe [o] were placed the targets and ſhields of beaten gold; for the diſtance from Lebanon to Jeruſalem would have made it very troubleſome to bring them up whenever they were wanted, beſides the riſk of being taken, to which ſuch coſtly armour would have been expoſed by the way; and indeed they were carried away by Shiſhak when he came up againſt the city [p].

NOT far from this palace, I think, was the Mattara, tranſlated Priſon [q]; but if it was one it was only like the Tower of London, or like our courts of law, or even the main corps-de-garde at the avenues of the palace. For in the court of this Mattara, Jeremiah was confined; but at the ſame time was allowed a good deal of liberty, ſince it was here he made the purchaſe of an eſtate in preſence of ſeveral witneſſes who ſigned the deed of agreement, and of all the Jews that lived there [r]. We read moreover [s], that afterwards the prophet was taken as he went out of Jeruſalem by the gate of Benjamin, and put in priſon (O) in the houſe of Jonathan [k] Ibid. 8 [l] Nehem. iii. [m] 1 Kings vi. [n] Ibid. ix. 19. 2 Chron. viii 6 [o] 1 Kings x. 17. [p] Ibid. xiv. 25, 26. [q] Nehem. iii. 25. coll. Jerem. xxxii. 2, [r] Jerem. xxxii. 12. [s] Ibid. xxxvii. 12.

(N) Beth is often taken in that ſenſe, as when Rebekah runs to her mother's beth (29), apartment, or lodging; and ſo is the houſe of the women (30) to be underſtood in the book of Eſther; the ſaid houſe probably not being ſeparate from the king's, but part of it.

(O) It is called בית האסור Beth haeſour, houſe of binding; otherwiſe it is called Beth כלא kele (31), the houſe of detaining;

(29) Gen. xxiv. 28. (30) Eſth. ii. 9. (31) Jerem. xxxvii. 15.

and

nathan the ſcribe, from whence by Zedekiah's order, he was transferred to the Mattara, where [t] he propheſied in the hearing of all the people. For this, at the requeſt of ſome of the great men, he was thrown into a dungeon full of ſoil, where, ſinking into the mire, and in want of all things, he would ſoon have periſhed, had not the king, at the entreaty of a pious Ethiopian proſelyte, given order for his being taken out again. The prophet remained in the above-mentioned court till the taking of Jeruſalem [u].

ALL this ſufficiently ſhews the Mattara to have been different from a priſon commonly ſo called. This appears clearly enough; but it is not ſo eaſy to determine the ſituation of this building, although it ſeems Nehemiah has undertaken to deſcribe it exactly; and if to us he does not appear to have ſo well ſucceeded in it, the fault lies neither at his door, nor at that of the language he wrote in, but to its being a dead language, many expreſſions of which are not ſo familiar to us as to be perfectly intelligible. However Nehemiah, as I underſtand him, ſays [w], "That Palal repaired the wall of Je-
"ruſalem, over-againſt the turning of the wall, and the "tower belonging to the king's houſe, the high tower (P)
"that was by the court of the Mattara."

[t] Ibid. xxxviii 1. [u] Ibid. 28. [w] Ubi ſup. iii. 25.

and in ſuch a houſe we ſee Micaiah the prophet (32), a king of Iſrael named Hoſhea (33) and the king of Judah Jeboiachin (34); and this place did bear ſo frightful an aſpect, as to make the prophet think it would ſoon cauſe his death (35).

(P) in our tranſlation this is called the tower which lieth out from the king's high houſe. In Hebrew, that epithet, the high, is more properly conſtrued, we ſhould think, by the word tower. The Septuagint has accordingly ἀνώτερος, which neceſſarily refers to πυργος, not οἶκος, in their text. Beſides, to lie out or project from a thing, according to the letter, is in the ſenſe, as we expreſs it, belonging to the ſame (36). But though it be well ſuſceptible of this ſenſe, when joined to that ſequel of the king's houſe, this phraſe may well admit of another ſignification, when without it; and this ſignification we then take to be, that of a great extent (37); ſo as the Mattara, its court included, being called by the name of this high tower, that ſet it off exceedingly, was, it ſeems, a long ſeries of buildings and walls, diſtant about fifty paces on the weſt ſide of the water gate.

(32) 1 Kings xxii. 27. & paſſ. (33) 2 Kings xvii. 4. & paſſ. (34) 2 Kings xxiv. 15. (35) Jerem. xxxviii. 26. (36) Vid. Mabbak. (37) Nehem. xxiii. 7.

HERE

HERE are two distinct indications of the reparations made by Palal in the wall; one near the turning of the wall going up to the water-gate, the other near the adjoining tower; and the situation of this tower is specified as well by its distinguishing height, as by its relation to the palace, and the neighbourhood of the court in question. So that to fix this to a point, we must look upon these buildings as being within the verge of the court, and under the immediate cognizance of king Solomon and his successors. Men there there intirely under their protection, neither could they be medled with without the king's express orders; although it was by their orders only, they were restrained within the bounds of these buildings.

WE are now come to buildings much less remarkable for their dignity, magnificence, or embellishments; but whose situation cannot well be omitted in the particular description we are about; I mean the station or post of the Nethinims [x]: It is said indeed they dwelt in Ophel, eastward, near the valley; but their משכב Mosbab, or dwelling, should not, we presume, be confounded with their house בית Beth, or, as in our version, their place. Then followed the hall, or place of the merchants or retailers, Haroshelim [y]; who, I believe, are the same as the Collybistæ, or money-changers [z], a sort of dealers very useful at the gate of the temple, where abundance of strangers resorted from all parts. But northward stood the house of the governor, supposed by some to be Nehemiah, and named in Hebrew Kisse-pakhath. This house was in * Atra*, near the gate of Ephraim. Our translation has the throne of the governor, and it might be called his court; it was like the Roman Prætorium, and had in it a tribunal, or a seat, which properly is what is meant by the Hebrew כסא Kisse [a]. This too is the primitive signification of Throne in Greek, from whence that word in our language is derived.

LITTLE is said concerning the walls of the city; but that little which is said we will here put together. 'Tis well known, after David had taken the strong hold of [b] Zion, he called it the city of David, and dwelt in that fort (Q), having built round

[x] Nehem. iii. 26. 31. rall. in Mark and John.

[y] Ibid.

[z] Matth. xxi. 12, and parall. in Mark and John.

[a] Nehem. iii. 7. Vid. MUNST. in loc.

[b] 2 Sam. v. 7, 9.

(Q) When David besieged Zion, the Jebusites said, "Except "he took away the blind and the lame, he should not come in "thither, thinking David could not come into the fort." The sense of which is not, to be sure, the most obvious at first reading; yet round about from Millo and inward [c], Afterwards Solomon built the wall of Jeruſalem [d], which took in all the eaſtern part at leaſt: However the king of Iſrael broke down the wall of Jeruſalem, from the gate of Ephraim unto the corner gate [e]. This is the wall on the north of Acra, from eaſt to weſt, according to the poſition of the gates, as we ſhall ſee hereafter; and truly although a broad wall was built there, it was always the weak ſide of Jeruſalem (R).

OF Jotham we read [f], On the wall of Ophel he built much; this lay to the ſouth-eaſt. Of Hezekiah, He ſtrengthened himſelf, and built up all the wall that was broken, (viz. by Joaſh, as above) and another wall without [g]. So alſo of Manaſſeh, He built a wall without the city of David, on the weſt ſide of Gihon, in the valley even to the entering in at the fiſh-gate, and compaſſed about Ophel [h]. Here you have almoſt the whole circuit of Jeruſalem, from ſouth to north by weſt, and to the ſouth-eaſt. Now to one of theſe latter buildings the prophet ſeems to allude, when ſpeaking of the breaches of the city of David, he adds, the houſes of Jeruſalem were broken down to fortify the walls [i]; though it may be alſo taken for a prophecy of the calamitous times that were to follow. Laſtly, it is reported, that when the city was broken up by the Chaldees [k], the ſoldiers fled by the two walls by the way of the king's garden, which was on the ſouth [l]; one of theſe walls being built by David or Solomon, adjoining immediately to the city; and the other, the new one without, by Hezekiah or Manaſſeh. We read alſo the army of the Chaldees brake down the wall of Jeruſalem round about [m], which was left, till Nehemiah's [n] time, with open breaches on every ſide.

[c] 1 Kings ix. 15. [d] Ibid. xiv. 13. [e] Nehem. iii. 8.
[f] 2 Chron. xxvii. 3. [g] Ibid. xxxii. 5. [h] Ibid. xxxiii. 14.
[i] Iſaiah xxii. 9, 10. [k] 2 Kings xxv. 4. Jerem. xxxix. 4.
[l] Nehem. iii. 15. [m] 2 Kings xxv. 10. [n] Chap. ii. 12, 15.

yet when well conſidered, it ſeems to be, This fort is ſo ſtrong of itſelf, that for its defence, lame and blind men are ſufficient. And to this ſtrength of the place it is owing, that the king promiſed to make chief or captain the man that would drive theſe people into the ditch (38).

(R) This Joſephus in ſeveral places gives to underſtand (39); and hence it happened, that both king Nebuchadnezzar and Titus attacked the city on this ſide (40).

(38) Vide Bochart Phaleg. l. iv. c. 36. (39) In Ecphraſi, No. 2. ubi de muris. Item. Ant. p. 448. xiv. 613. & Bell. Jud. 389. (40) Ubi ſup. Ant. & Bell. Jud.

Gates. IN antient Jeruſalem, the gates, שערים Shahărim, were ten in number [o], viz. five from weſt to eaſt by ſouth, and five others by north: Here are their names, as they are to be found in the text and tranſlation;

By ſouth,	1. Dung-gate,	Haaſ-poth.
	2. Fountain-gate,	Haain or en.
	3. Water-gate,	Hammajim.
	4. Horſe-gate,	Haſouſſim.
	5. Priſon-gate,	Hamiphkad.
By north,	1. Valley-gate	Haggai or ge.
	2. Gate of Ephraim,	Ephraim.
	3. Old-gate,	Haieſhan.
	4. Fiſh-gate,	Hadaggim.
	5. Sheep-gate,	Hazon.

Now as to that which is called of the valley, the entrance was on the weſt: By this gate Nehemiah went out of the city, in order to viſit the ruins of Jeruſalem; he likewiſe placed himſelf upon this gate, or upon the wall cloſe to it, when he made the dedication of the building of Jeruſalem, by a double proceſſion of the people, one half going to the right, or ſouth, the other to the left, or north, in order to come by the eaſt to the temple. As they did not go through this gate from which they ſet out, no mention is made of it in the account given of the places through which the proceſſions paſſed [p], but only where the particulars are given of the repairing the walls and gates of Jeruſalem [q]. Neither in this account of the proceſſions is the horſe-gate mentioned, probably, becauſe the rubbiſh ſtopped up the paſſage, which was the reaſon that they turned to the left to go to the temple. This gate is placed to the eaſt by Jeremiah [r], and it was through it that Athaliah went from the temple to the palace [s]: But, we muſt confeſs, it is not ſo eaſy to aſſign the cauſe for which the dung-gate is omitted in this account: However, it is ſpoken of in the rebuilding of the wall; and when Nehemiah did view the ruins, it is again mentioned by the name of the dung-port *.

As to the water-gate turning to the eaſt [t], it is likely that it anſwered the ſouthern part of the palace, by the place or ſquare in which Ezra read the law to all the people [u].

[o] Ibid. Conf. iii. & xii. [p] Nehem. xii. 38. [q] Ibid. iii. 13.
[r] Jer. xxxi. 40. 2 Kings xi. &c. See above. [s] Nehem. xi. 37. * Nehem. iii. 64. Ibid. ii. 13. [t] Ibid. iii. 21. viii. 1. [u] Ibid. xii. 31.

THE

THE priſon-gate is in Hebrew Miphkad[w]. This word, which is kept in the tranſlation, ſignifies viſitation, and by deduction, judgment, correction, ward, priſon. It is alſo called the gate of Mattara (S), in our tranſlation priſon-gate[x]. It ſtood eaſtward of the palace and city both.

IT is plain, the gate of Ephraim took its name from its joining the high-way leading to that tribe. This may ſerve to aſcertain the truth of the ſituation we have given of the city.

THE ſheep-gate furniſhes us with means of explaining the word προβατικὴ, in the goſpel according to St. John[y], where our tranſlation has, there was a pool near the ſheep-market, in the text, and gate in the margin, viz. αγορά, or πύλη. And the tranſlation in the text ſeems the moſt probable; for a ſheep-market was there near the gate of the ſame name, and ſeems to have between the gate and the pool, that of Beth-eſda, on the north-eaſt of the temple (T).

LASTLY, the fiſh-gate[z] did anſwer to one afterwards built in the new city, and called the gate of Joppe, a ſea-port on the Mediterranean.

[w] Nehem. iii. 31. [x] Nehem. iii. 12. xii. 39. & al. [y] Chap. v. 2. [z] 2 Kings xiv. 13.

(S) Of the Mattara itſelf we ſpoke above, as pretty near the palace that lay northward of it: And what ſeems to have given the name of either Mattara or Miphkad to this gate is, that thoſe words well agree in their general notions; which reaſon appears to us more likely, than that the great Sanhedrin had there its ordinary ſittings, it being at leaſt dubious whether at that time this court had any juriſdiction, or even exiſted. Yet we do not deny, but that courts of juſtice were kept at the gates (41), and therefore priſons might be there alſo, and houſes of correction beſides.

(T) Though Joſephus does not mention it by name, yet he (42) places a pool there, and thereabouts Mr. Maundrell found a large empty baſon, of which he gives the following deſcription (43). "It is 120 paces long, 40 broad, and at leaſt eight deep, but void "of water. At its weſt end it diſcovers ſome old arches, now "dammed up: Theſe ſome will have to be the five porches in "which lay that multitude of lame, &c. The pool is contiguous "on one ſide to St. Stephens gate, on the other to the area of the "temple."

(41 Vide Deut. xvii. 8. Amos v. 15. Zech. viii. 16. & al.
(42) Bell. Jud. p. 1248. (43) See his journey, &c. 107.

THESE, we think, are all the gates of Jerusalem, either as it stood before the captivity, or as, after the return from it, it was repaired by Nehemiah. It cannot be denied, but a few others seem to be mentioned in that space of time; but we take them to be only different names given to those already mentioned. And first, the corner-gate [a], which, in our opinion, must be the same with the old-gate, as may be gathered from Jeremiah's occasionally giving the circuit of Jerusalem from the north-east, over against the temple; [i. e. from the tower of Hananeel] unto the gate of the corner (U), going along to the north-west, where stood the hills Gareb and Goath (X), afterwards called Golgotha, or Calvary.

[a] 2 Chron. xxvi. 9.

(U) Although the translation here somewhat differs from that above, the word in both places in the original is Happinnah. It is true in Zechariah it is read Happinim, as if one should say: the corners, but the sense is the same if (44) translated the corner. Lastly, this our translation, in the parallel to Kings, answers (45) the Hebrew word Happoneh, where the margin has the gate of it that looketh; which is not easy to be understood, unless, by supposing it to be an elliptical expression, the sense is made up by what we find added elsewhere (46), viz. Zaphonah to the north, which is a true indication of the said gate: However, it may be thought this various reading is owing to the carelessness of the transcriber, as it seems may be collected from the Septuagint's having here πύλης γωνίας, corner-gate; yet notice should be taken, that this gate did lie towards the σκόπος. By this name was called (47), not only the eminence, (from whence coming from the north one first discovered Jerusalem) but also the plain next to the city on that side: Now that in Hebrew would be Phaneh, or Haphoneh, which we leave to our reader's consideration.

(X) As the word גלגלתה, which according to the Masoreth's pointing is read Goath, may as well, if not better, be pronounced either Goatha or Gotha; and as the word גל, admitting of two sounds in the composition of known names Galhed and Gilhad, does as naturally sound Gol; we should think the etymology of Golgotha is found to our hand, and its signification most plain, viz. the heap of Gotha: However, the great likeness the sound of this same word Golgotha had to Gagultha, in Syriac, (which dialect is called Hebrew in the gospel (48), because a mixture of both was what was generally spoken at Jerusalem) it seems to have been commonly understood, as having a near relation to Gulgaltha (49),

(44) See above. (45) 2 Chron. xxv. 23. (46) Ezek. viii. 3. (47) Vide Joseph. de Bell. Jud. v. 2. 1216. (48) John xix. 17. (49) Targ. on 2 Kings ix. 35.

a scull, vary. Then, according to the directions in the prophet, one turns towards the ſouth, through the valley of Hinnom, and the ſouth-eaſt fields called the fuller's fields, unto the corner of the horſe-gate to the eaſt [b]: So alſo in Zechariah [c], All the land ſhall be as a plain to Rimmon, ſouth of Jeruſalem, and inhabited from Benjamin's gate (Y) unto the firſt gate unto the corner-gate, and from the tower of Hananeel unto the King's wine-preſſes. Here firſt you have Jeruſalem, on the ſouth, a hilly country there, to be turned into a plain; which is eaſily apprehended to be figuratively ſpoken. But further, the northern ſide is traced here from a gate going to the neighbour tribe of Benjamin [d] to the old-gate, here called the firſt; the following words unto the corner-gate, being an explanation of the former unto the firſt gate: So you go up to the eaſt by the tower there, returning to the ſouth, where was the royal garden. Another gate is mentioned in Jeremiah [e], where he is bid to go forth unto the valley of the ſon of Hinnom, which is by the entry of the eaſt-gate, but ſhould be rather the brick-gate (Z), or of the brick-bats, it a ſcull, and therefore well expounded by κρανίουτόπος (50), which from the Latin Calvaria, a ſcull, is called in our language Calvary. Mr. Maundrell ſays, the church of the holy ſepulchre is founded upon mount Calvary, which is a ſmall eminence, or hill: It was anciently ſhut out of the walls of the city, but ſince it hath attracted the city round about it, and ſtands now in the midſt of Jeruſalem. Journey, p. 68, & 69.

[b] Jerem. xxxi. 38—40. [c] Zechar. xiv. 10. [d] Jerem. xxxvii. 13, &c. [e] Ibid. xix. 2.

(Y) There is a gate called the high gate of Benjamin (51), which is ſaid to have been by the houſe of the Lord: It might alſo be tranſlated in the houſe. If this ſenſe be followed, the gate is none of the ten we are inquiring about; if the former, this is the gate that led into the land of Benjamin, and is further called the higher gate, which lieth towards the north (52).

(Z) It may be thus tranſlated, ſuppoſing only here (53) an eaſy and common permutation of letters, as appears in the pronunciation of Sibboleth for (54) Shibboleth. This is the more probable, becauſe there is already in the text a various reading of Harſſorth for Harſſith: However, Heres, in the Hebrew חרסים, is a brick, and Heres, in Chaldee חרס, the ſun. So we chooſe to take it here, as if it was written חרשית, looking upon it as the dung-gate, that opened into the valley of Hinnom, and that of aſhes.

(50) Matth. xxvii. 33. (51) Jer. xx. 2. In Hebrew it is ב, which is read in this ſenſe, Numb. xxxvi. Jerem. xiii. 5. xxxii. 5. & al. (52) Ezek. ix. 2. (53) Jerem. xix. 2. (54) Judg. xii. 6.

being

being the ſame with the dung-gate, where was the valley of Aſhes [f]. But we do not take the city-gate [g] to be one of the ten of Jeruſalem, but rather a gate of the city of David, or Zion, to the north-weſt, leading to the valley-gate, and ſince called Zion-gate [h].

THE ſituation of (שער התוך Shaar Hattavek) the middle-gate, may be deduced from what is ſaid in Jeremiah [i]; Nebuchadnezzar's army, after having entered into Jeruſalem by the north, advanced as far as this middle-gate, of which Zedekiah being informed, he made his eſcape, as has already been obſerved [k], through his garden to the ſouth. This plainly ſhews that this gate muſt have ſtood in the midſt of the valley between Acra and Zion.

Towers. A WORD or two more concerning the towers, as related by Nehemiah. They were four. Indeed, it is ſaid of Uzziah [l], "He built towers in Jeruſalem, at the corner-gate, "and at the valley-gate, and at the the turning of the wall;" but how many he built is not ſaid. However the names, of the ſaid four towers were Meah, eaſtward; Hananeel, north-eaſtward; Hattanourim, of the furnaces, weſtward; and Ophel, ſouth-eaſtward. The firſt named of theſe was alſo the firſt built [m]; near this they paſſed going to the ſheep-gate, in the dedication of the walls [n]; the ſecond, called Hananeel, lay more to the north; and the third quite to the weſt. From beyond this tower it is ſaid [o] they, in the dedication, went to the broad wall. Laſtly, from the fourth, Ophel, a ward ſo called [p], and the wall itſelf joining to it [q], took their name; but properly it is a tower [r], and ſuppoſed to be very high (A), and we ſhould think was made uſe of as a watch tower [s], from whence one might ſee and obſerve a-far off. It is ſaid king Manaſſeh raiſed it up to a great height [t]; and of this tower Joſephus ſpeaks, when he ſays, that the wall paſſing through Ophlas was carried on ſo as to join the eaſt portico of the temple [u].

[f] Jerem. xxxi. 40. [g] 2 Chron. xxxii. 6. [h] See MAUND. ubi ſup. [i] xxxix. 3, &c. [k] See above. [l] 2 Chr. xxvi. 9. [m] Neh. iii. 1. [n] Ibid. xii. 39. [o] Ibid. xii. 38. [p] Ibid. iii. 26. [q] Ibid. 27. [r] 2 Kings v. 24. [s] See Iſai. xxxii. 14. in the margin. [t] 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14. [u] Bell. Jud. vi. 6.

(A) This ſeems to appear by the very etymology of the word; for which we are beholden to the prophet's ſaying Opbla (55), for what is in the tranſlation lifted up.

(55) Hab. ii. 4.

Or

Waters.

OF the waters and ſprings in or about Jeruſalem we have had occaſion to ſay ſomething before [w]; but for a further knowledge of the ſame, it will be proper here to add what Mr. Maundrell tells us concerning the pool of Gihon; "It "lies, ſays he, about two furlongs without Bethleem gate, "weſtward; it is a ſtately pool, 106 paces long, and 67 "broad, and lined with wall and plaiſter, and was, when "we were there, well ſtored with water." This helps to underſtand the better what is related of Hezekiah [x]; "He "ſtopped the upper water-courſe of Gihon, and brought it "ſtrait down to the weſt of the city of David." Theſe naturally ran to the ſouth and eaſt out of the city; but the king turned off the courſe of this ſtream, in order to make it run towards the weſt in Zion. According to the Targum, Gihon is the ſame as Shiloh; nevertheleſs it is plain, there were there two pools, ſince Gihon is named the upper pool. Now as there was a lower pool, this laſt might be Shiloh, of which the upper was the ſpring; notwithſtanding one might be apt to think, that Gihon was only a baſon or reſervoir, into which the water came from En-rogel, that is to ſay, the fuller's fountain where Adonijah offered his ſacrifice [y] at the time of his aſpiring to the throne. But, it is poſſible, this may have no other foundation than the ſituation given to Gihon in the fuller's field. And although the word Rogel may ſignify a fuller, yet the word [z] כובס, as is made uſe of more properly implies it. However, ſince in the time of Hezekiah the water of Shiloh, or Gihon, was brought into the city, and that in all appearance when the city roſe again from its ruins, it was reſtored to the ſame advantage; it is no wonder, that Tacitus [a] places here fontem perennis aquæ.

THE king's pool is mentioned in Nehemiah [b], as being near the fountain-gate, that is, to the ſouth-weſt of Zion: It is called by Joſephus [c] the pool of Solomon, and placed (which comes to one) winding towards the eaſt. Iſaiah [d] ſpeaks of the old pool, whoſe water had been made to run between the two walls, and might be the ſame as that made by Hezekiah, barely called the pool made [e], which might be named the artificial pool; not but that it was a natural ſpring, but becauſe art had been made uſe of in order to make it water the eaſtern parts of Zion: However, one of the moſt renowned waters in Jeruſalem was the brook of Cedron, whoſe head ſpring did not run very plentifully, for in ſummer it was generally dried up, but in rainy weather the quantity of waters falling from the mountains increaſed it ſo prodigiouſly, that it looked rather like a river than a brook. In the Hebrew its name is pronounced Kidron, as our tranſlation has expreſſed it, as where it is ſaid, "King David paſſed over the brook Kidron, toward the way of the wilderneſs [f]," What the word does ſignify ſeems not of great conſequence, yet it may be remarked, that according to St. Jerome [g], it is ſaid a tenebris, and truly קדר Kadar, is to be dark or black. Accordingly Joſephus [h], who often calls Cedron a valley, ſays it was very deep, and at the foot of the mount of olives, on the eaſt [i]; but in one place [k] he names it χειμάῤῥους, and ſo in the new teſtament we find it called [l].

[w] See before, note E. [x] 2 Chron. xxxii. 30. [y] 1 Kings i. 19. [z] 2 Kings xviii. 17. [a] Hiſt. l. 5. c. 12. [b] Cap. ii. 14. [c] In Ecphraſi 1288. [d] Cap. xxii. 11. [e] Nehem. iii. 16.

head

To conclude; we dare flatter ourſelves we have faithfully repreſented Jeruſalem as it antiently ſtood, from about the times of David to the Babyloniſh captivity: For though it may be objected, that Nehemiah, from whom moſt of our proofs are borrowed, lived ſeveral years after the return of the Jews to the holy city, yet it muſt be allowed, that it was not raiſed upon any new plan, but only rebuilt upon its antient foundations. The walls indeed have been pulled down, the gates burnt to aſhes; but yet the remains, or at leaſt ſome marks or out-lines of them all, were ſtill to be ſeen, and parts of ſeveral of them were ſtill ſubſiſting. So as we read in Nehemiah [m], the breaches were ſtopped up, the buildings re-edified, and the whole city reſtored as much as poſſible, to its former condition.

[f] 2 Sam. xv. 23. [g] In Jerem. xxxi. 40. [h] Bell. Jud. 1231, 1251. [i] Ibid. 1216. [k] Antiq. viii. 335. [l] John xv. iii. 1. [m] Chap. iv. 7. coll. vi. 1.

INDEX

EXPLANATION of the Plan of the City of Jerusalem.

A THE Sheep Gate
B The Fiſh Gate
C The old Gate, or Corner Gate
D The Gate of Ephraim E The Valley Gate
F The Dung Gate
G The Gate of the Fountain
H The Water Gate
I The Horſe Gate
K The Gate Miphkad
1 The Tower of Meah
2 The Tower of Hananeel
3 The Governor's Houſe
4 The Gate from the City of David towards the Valley
5 Another Gate from the ſaid City againſt the Stairs
6 The Sepulchre of David
7 The Pool of Shiloh
8 The King's Garden
9 The Pool made by Hezekiah
10 The Houſe of the mighty, or the Guard Houſe
11 The Arſenal or Armory
12 The High-prieſt's Palace
13 The Houſe of Azariah
14 The Mattarah or State Priſon
15 The Place where Ezra read the Law
16 The Tower of Ophel
17 The Station of the Nethinims 18 The Money-changer's Hall
19 The Pool by the Sheep Market, called Bethesda 20 The middle Gate in the Valley
21 The Dragon's Well
22 The King's Pool
23 The Broad Wall
24 The Miczoah, or turning of the Wall

N. B. See the Particulars of the Temple in the foregoing Plan of it.

A PLAN of the CITY of JERUSALEM

according to the Description thereof in the Books of the OLD TESTAMENT but more especially in that of NEHEMIAH

South
North East or
the Suburbs
MOUNT
SION
MOUNT MORIAH Millo
The King's House
The Temple
Bor or Maktesh called in later times Tyropoeon
The Brook Cedron Garden Grounds or Bezetha Gareb
C
B A
H I K Paces Stades
25 50 75 100 125 200 250 300 375 500
1 2 3 4

D.P.S

AN INDEX TO THE THIRD VOLUME.

The Numbers direct to the Page, and the great Letters to the Notes.

A.

AARON, his two ſons, Nadab and Abihu, killed by fire from heaven, for preſuming to burn incenſe in the tabernacle with ſtrange fire, contrary to Moſes's command, 1. Why excluded from ſetting his foot in the promiſed land, 18. Moſes commanded to ſtrip him of his prieſtly robes, and to array his ſon Eleazar with them, 19. Which was no ſooner done than he died in the 123d year of his age, the 40th year after the Exod, ibid. The children of Iſrael mourn 30 days for him, ibid.

Abarim, a ridge of mountains, reaching from the tribe of Reuben to the land of Moab, 29, (B).

Abb, 11th month of the Jewiſh year, anſwering to our July, 189, (K).

Abdon judges Iſrael eight years, 474.

Abiathar, one of Abimelech's ſons, eſcapes the univerſal ſlaughter of Saul, 500. Flies to David, ibid. High-prieſt, 551. Depoſed by Solomon, and confined to his own territories, ibid.

Abib, a month ſo called by Moſes, but afterwards Niſan, anſwering to our March or April, 172, (Q). Etymology of the word Abib, ibid.

Abihu, killed by fire from heaven for burning incenſe in the tabernacle with ſtrange fire, 1.

Abimelech, a natural ſon of Gideon's, 460. His character, ib. Murders all the ſons of Gideon, except the youngeſt, 461. Proclaimed king by the Shechemites, and thoſe of Millo, ib. Razes the town of Shechem, 465, & 466. His cruelty to the inhabitants, ibid. Being wounded with a ſtone by a woman, commands his ſervant Zebul to diſpatch him, 466.

Abinadab, the ark placed in his houſe, where it continues about 70 years, 482.

Abiram, one of the houſe of Reuben, 11. Joins Korah in a conſpiracy againſt Moſes, ibid. His inſolent language to Moſes, 12. His dreadful puniſhment, 14.
Abner proclaims Iſh-boſheth king of Iſrael, 512. Defeated by Joab, 513. Runs Aſahel through with his ſpear, ibid. Revolts to David, 514. Killed by Joab, 515.
Abſalom, pillar of, in the valley of Jehoſhaphat, deſcribed, 147, & (N).
Abſalom murders Amnon, 529. Shelters himſelf with the king of Geſhur, 530. Reconciled to his father, 532. Rebels againſt him, 538. His army defeated by David's, ibid. Hung by the hair of his head, is killed by Joab, ibid.
Aceldama, or field of blood, 133.
Achan, the ſon of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah, conceals ſome of the accurſed plunder of Jericho, 71. Is diſcovered, and puniſhed with death, ibid.
Achor, or trouble, the valley of, where Achan was puniſhed with death for his ſacrilege, 71.
Acre St. John de, or Acra, deſcription of its ruins, 137.
Adam, the city of, above the place where the waters of the Jordan divided themſelves, 63, (Y).
Adar, the 6th month of the Jewiſh year, anſwering our February, 190, (K).
Adonijah conſpires againſt David, 546. Pardoned by Solomon, 547. But afterwards put to death by him, 551.
Adultery, laws againſt it, 317. The law againſt adultery in ſome Greek copies, placed before that of murder, ibid. (G). Some have taken great pains to prove the former the moſt grievous crime of the two, ibid.
Abimelech put to death by Saul's orders, 500.
Ahithophel revolts from David to Abſalom, 532. His pernicious advice to Abſalom, 535. Hangs himſelf, 536.
Ahitub, ſon of Phineas, ſuppoſed to have ſucceeded his grandfather in the high-prieſt's office, 400.
Ai, attacked by the Iſraelites, who are at firſt repulſed, but afterwards maſter it, 70, & ſeq.
Ajalon, the valley where Joſhua commanded the moon to ſtand ſtill, 73, (G).
Almah, the unmarried damſels why ſo called among the Jews, 325, & (P).
Alphabet Samaritan and Hebrew, 406.
Alphonſo, king of Naples, two prophane ſayings of, 73.
Amalekites, excluded for ever from the congregation of the Lord, 295 & 296.
Amaſa treacherouſly murdered by Joab, 541.
Amnon, his inceſt with Tamar, 528. Murdered by Abſalom, 529.
Anathemas,

Anathemas, or things vowed to deſtruction, various inſtances of, among the Jews, 227.
Ark of the old teſtament, a ſmall cheſt made of ſhittim-wood, and covered over with beaten gold, 272, & ſeq. Its length and breadth, 275. Why called the ark of the covenant, and the ark of the teſtament, ibid. Some of opinion that there were two arks, one made by Moſes, and the other by Bezaleel, ibid. Confuted, ibid. Taken by the Philiſtines, 480. What betided it, and how ſent back, ibid. Brought by David to Jeruſalem, 519. David's zeal and piety on that occaſion, ibid.
Arnon, a brook or torrent, running between the countries of the Ammonites and Moabites, and diſcharging itſelf into the dead ſea 21, (V). Suppoſed to have been the firſt northern boundary of the children of Iſrael, 94, (G).
Aſahel, brother of Joab, killed by Abner, 513.
Aſher, his lot in the promiſed land, 95.
Aſphaltite lake, ſo called from the quantity of bitumen in and about it, 111, (I). Called alſo the dead ſea, becauſe it breeds no fiſh, nor any thing that has life, ibid. (†). And likewiſe the ſalt ſea, becauſe in the higheſt degree impregnated with ſalt, 112, & (K). Believed, without foundation, to have riſen from the ſubmerſion of the vale of Siddim, ibid. & 113, (L). Said to change colour three times a day, ibid. (M). Apples growing on the borders of it called infernal apples a mere fable, ibid. No remains of the five infamous cities to be ſeen now, ibid. (N) Its length, breadth, and waters, 114.

B

BAAL-Berith, etymology of the name, 460, (I).
Baana and Rechab murder Iſh-boſheth, 515. Put to death by David, ibid.
Balaam, ſlain with five kings of Midian by the Iſraelites, 26. Some obſcure places of his prophecies explained, 23, (Y).
Bamoth, or Bamoth-arnon, that is, the high places of Arnon, an encampment of the Iſraelites on their march to the promiſed land, 21.
Barak and Deborah defeat Siſera, 452.
Baſtards, and all illegitimate iſſue, not to be admitted into the congregation of the Lord, till after the tenth generation, 295.
Bath-ſheba, wife of Uriah, her adultery, 525. Married to David, 526.
Beer, an incampment of the Iſraelites on their march to the promiſed land, 21. So called from the well which the heads of the Iſraelites dug there by God's direction, ibid.

This gave birth to that ſong of Moſes, which was ſung by the Iſraelites; Spring up, O well, ſing ye unto it, ibid.
Beheading, never practiſed among the Jews, in a judicial way before the captivity, 312.
Belus, a river, its ſand, an excellent material for the making of glaſs, miniſtred the firſt hint for that invention, 125.
Benaiah ſucceeds Joab in the poſt of general, 551.
Benjamites, or tribe of Benjamin, defeat that of Judah, and kill 22,000 of their men, 448. Repulſe them from Gibeath, with the loſs of 18,000 men on the ſide of Judah, ib. Are at laſt defeated with the loſs of 25,000 men, 449. Their cities burnt down, and the whole tribe deſtroyed by the other tribes, except 600 men, 449, & ſeq. Reſtored, 450. Rebuild their cities, ibid.
Bethabara, not far from the place where the Iſraelites croſſed the Jordan 63, (Y).
Bethagil, a village where no one circumciſed is ſaid to live above three days, 129, (T).
Bethlehem, David deſires ſome water of the well there, 516. Why he choſe rather to ſpill it on the ground than to drink it, ib.
Bethſhemeſhites, fifty thouſand and ſeventy of their men puniſhed with immediate death for looking into the ark, 481.
Bleſſing how and on what occaſion uſed by Jews, 351.
Blood, the prohibition of eating it as old as the deluge, 339. Not only forbidden to the Iſraelites, but to the ſtrangers that lived among them, upon pain of death, 340. Why forbid, ibid. & (D).
Bootcſhellah the village of, ſaid to have this ſtrange property, that no Mohammedan can live in it above two years, 128, & (T).
Boticella, a village where it is reported, that no Turk can live above eight days, 129, (T).
Breaſt-plate of the Jewiſh high-prieſt deſcribed, 240, & 241. Why called memorial, 242. Names of the 12 precious ſtones faſtened in it, with the tribe that was engraven upon each of them, 241, (X).

C.

CABBALA Jewiſh, or oral tradition full of carnal and ridiculous notions, 155. Another Cabbala, called by diſtinction Kabla, or reception, contains the myſtical ſenſe of the old teſtament, received by ſome of the antient fathers, and defended by ſeveral modern writers, 156.
Cadeſh-barneah, the fifteenth encampment of the Jews from their coming out of Egypt, 9.

Caleb, one of the twelve that were chosen by Moses to view the land of Canaan, 6. His and Joshua's report of it, ib. Caleb takes and burns Jerusalem 444.
Canaan, or Chanaan, includes the whole land possessed by the twelve tribes, but peculiarly belongs to no more than that country westward of the river Jordan, 90, (A). Its fertility, 370. Vid. Land of Promise.
Candlestick of the sanctuary described, 279, &c. Whether the lamps burnt only in the night, 280, (Z). Entertained by the purest virgin oil of olives, 281.
Caraites, a wise and antient sect among the Jews, reject the Cabbala, 155. Hated by the Talmudists, ibid.
Carcob, the meaning of the word, 285, (E).
Carmel mount, its situation, 99. Famed for its fertility, and for being the favourite place of Pythagoras, ib. Elias supposed to have sojourned there in a cave, before he was ravished into heaven, 100. The name common both to a town and a mountain, 99, (T). Distinguished very early by the Christians with particular marks of piety, 100, (X). From hence proceeded the order of the frier Carmelites, ib. Melons, olives, and such like fruits in stone found there, 125.
Chasleu, the third month among the Jews, answering our November, 190, (K).
Cherubims, that overshadowed the mercy-seat, made of pure gold, 273. Their form, posture, and attitude, ib. Divers opinions concerning their shape, ib. (V). Etymology of the word. ib.
Chronology, Jewish, 434. The Jewish chronicles, ibid. & seq.
Circumcision, discontinued in the wilderness, and why, 46. Renewed immediately after the Israelites passed the Jordan, 64. By whom, with what instrument, and in what manner performed, 348, & 349. Several superstitious customs added to the ceremony by the Jews, 349. (I). The child used to be named then by the parents, ib.
Cities of refuge. Vid. Refuge.
Cleanness, laws of Moses concerning it, 344.
Crucifying, not a Jewish but a Roman punishment, 313, (D).
Chushhan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, defeated by Othniel, the first judge of the Israelites, 451.

D.

DAN, a city built by the tribe of that name, 447. An idol set up there, continued till the captivity of the land, ibid.

Daniel the prophet, his writings not admitted by the Jews among thoſe of the other prophets, 433, (O). Why, ib.
Dathan, one of the Heads of the houſe of Reuben, 11. Joins with Korah in a conſpiracy againſt Moſes, ibid. & 12. His inſolent language to Moſes, ibid. His dreadful puniſhment, 14.
David, the ſon of Jeſſe, diſpels the evil ſpirit from Saul by playing on the harp, 494. Is made his armour-bearer, ibid. Kills Goliath, 496. His intimate friendſhip with Jonathan, ibid. Forced to ſave himſelf in the land of Nob, 499. Flies to Achiſh king of Gath, ibid. From thence he retires into the cave of Adullam, ibid. Inſtances of his generoſity towards Saul, 502, & ſeq. Flies into the foreſt of Hareth, in the land of Judah, 501. A covenant ratified between him and Jonathan, ibid. Gains Michal Saul's ſecond daughter, with the death of 200 Philiſtines, 497. Saved by her, when in danger of his life from Saul, ibid. Anointed by Samuel in Saul's room, 493. Cauſes the meſſenger to be put to death, who brought the tidings of Saul's death, 512. Again anointed king over Judah at Hebron, 512. Marries Maacah, daughter of Talmai king of Geſhur, 513. Has by her Abſalom and Tamar, ibid. Puts to death the murderers of Iſh-boſheth, 515. Reigns over all the 12 tribes, except part of that of Benjamin, ibid. Beſieges and takes Jeruſalem, 516. Makes Sion his reſidence, and calls it the city of David, ibid. Removes the ark to Jeruſalem, 518. His piety and zeal on that occaſion, 519. Invaded by the Philiſtines, routs them in two ſucceſſive battles. 516. His alliance with Hiram king of Tyre, 517. Forbid by the prophet Nathan to undertake the building of the temple, 520 & 521. His oeconomy, policy, &c. 521 & ſeq. His gratitude towards Jonathan's ſons, 524. Revenges on the Ammonites the affront put on his embaſſadors, 524 & ſeq. His adultery and murder, 525 & 526. God's ſevere Judgment denounced againſt him by Nathan, 526. Fulfilled, 527 & ſeq. Charges his officers to be tender of Abſalom's life, 537. His grief for the loſs of him, 538. Acknowledged by all the tribes, ibid. Forgives Shimei, 539. A new revolt againſt him, 540. Numbers the people, 543. Which brings a peſtilence on the land, 544. Orders Solomon to be proclaimed, 546. His laſt inſtructions to Solomon, 549. Dies in the 70th year of his age, ibid. His vaſt riches and burial, ibid.
Dead-Sea. Vid. Aſphaltite lake.
Deborah, fourth judge of Iſrael, defeats Jabin king of Canaan, 452.

Diet among the Jews, very plain, 357.
Diverſions uſed among the Jews, 357.
Divinations various kinds of, practiſed by the Jews, 354. How performed, ibid. (P).
Divorce, permitted to the Jews, for the hardneſs of their hearts, 330. Never practiſed by any of the patriarchs, ibid. In what caſes allowed, ibid. The form of the bill of divorce, 332. Whether women might likewiſe divorce their huſbands, 333. (X).
Doeg, an Edomite, one of Saul's ſhepherds puts to death, by his order, the high-prieſt Abimelech, 500.
Dreſs, laws concerning that of the Jews, 342.

E.

EBAL mount, 106.
Ebal and Gerizzim, bleſſings and curſes to be ſet up on theſe two hills, 36, & 37.
Edomites, they could be received into the congregation of the Lord after the ſecond generation, 294.
Egyptians, received into the congregation of the Lord, after the ſecond generation, 295.
Ehud, ſecond judge of Iſrael, ſtabs Eglon king of Moab, and frees the Iſraelites, from the yoke of that Nation, 451.
Elah, or of the Terebinth, the valley of, where David ſlew Goliath, 108.
Eldad and Medad, two of the number of the elders who went not to the tabernacle, but prophcſied in the camp, 3, (H). Said by the Jews to have been brothers to Moſes, by the mother's ſide, 4, (H). A ſpurious book, quoted by Hermas, entitled Eldad and Medad, their prophecies, ibid. (H).
Eleazar, commanded by Moſes to take the cenſers of Korah, and his men, and beat them into broad plates, for a covering of the altar, 14. Commanded to ſtrip his father of the prieſtly robes, and array himſelf with them, 19. Succeeds his father in the high-prieſthood, ibid.
Eli, judge and high-prieſt of Iſrael, 475. His indolence and remiſſneſs towards his ſons, ibid. In his time the Jews again ſlaves to the Philiſtines, ibid. Threatened with the loſs of the high-prieſthood, the death of his ſons, and ruin of his family, 478. His unhappy death, 480.
Elon judges Iſrael ten years, 474.
Elul, a feaſt kept to this day by the Jews, in memory of the puniſhment and death inflicted on the ten ſpies, who cauſed, with their ill report, an inſurrection, 8. The twelfth month of the Jewiſh year, anſwering to our Auguſt, 190, (K).
Ephod of the Jewiſh high-prieſt deſcribed, 240, &c.
Ephraim the wood of, 111.

Ephraimites threaten Jephthah, and are defeated with great loſs by the Gileadites, 472, & 473.
Eſdraelon, or Legion, the plain of, 108.
Eunuchs of all kinds excluded from the congregation of the Lord, 296. What meant by that expreſſion, ibid.
Excommunication, the moſt dreadful of all the Jewiſh puniſhments, though not a capital one, 313. Enoch ſuppoſed the author of it, ibid. & 314. Paſſed from the Jews to the Chriſtians, 315. Never uſed by the primitive church in that damning ſenſe, in which the Jews, and ſome modern churches underſtand it, ibid. Three kinds of excommunication among the Jews, 314, (E).
Expiation-day, or day of atonement among the Jews, the only one of humiliation, by divine appointment, 201. Why ordained, ibid. How kept, 202. The high-prieſt's office on this day more ſolemn and awful, ibid. Ceremonies practiſed on this occaſion, ibid. & ſeq. Other expiations were to be performed, 208.

F.

FAMINE, averted by the death of ſeven of Saul's ſons, 541.
Feaſts, ceremonies uſed by the Jews, at their feaſts, 350, & 351.
Firſt-born of the males not to be reſtrained to the eldeſt ſon, 218. Whether Jeſus was ſubject to this law, 219, (F). The firſt-born of clean beaſts alſo conſecrated to God, and could not be redeemed, ibid. Ceremonies uſed in killing it, ibid. If unclean it might be redeemed, 219, 220, & (G). Laws relating to the firſt product of trees, ibid.
Firſt-fruits, every one among the Jews obliged by law to offer thoſe of his fields, orchards, and vineyards, 216. Neither the time nor the quantity preſcribed by the written law, ibid. Agreed by their wiſe men, that they ought at leaſt to amount to the ſixtieth part of the product, ibid. After the building of the temple, all obliged to bring them thither, ibid. Ceremonies uſed on that occaſion, ibid. & 217. Several remarkable particulars, concerning theſe ceremonies, from the Talmud, 216, (C). Under this head included the firſt cake of every lump of dough that exceeded the bulk of 40 eggs, 217.
Fornication, how puniſhed among the Jews, 318.
Funeral ceremonies uſed by the Jews, 360, & ſeq.

G.

GAD, his lot in the promiſed land, 95.
Gad prophet, ſent to David, 544.
Galilee ſea of, 115.
Games of no kind among the Jews, 356. Not only forbid, but but abhorred by all good Iſraelites, ibid. (Q). Games of hazard looked upon by them as a kind of theft, 357.

Geneſarit, lake of, 114.
Gerar the vale of, where Iſaac ſojourned, when he departed from Abimelech, 106.
Gerizim mount, 37, & 106.
Gerſhon, one of the main branches of the Levites, 231.
Gethſemane, vale of, 135.
Gezer, the ſame city, according to ſome, given to Solomon by Pharaoh for his wife's dowry, 552.
Gibeah the inhabitants of, guilty of a horrid breach of hoſpitality, 447.
Gibeon, where Joſhua commanded the ſun to ſtand, 73. The wilderneſs of Gibeon, 110.
Gibeonites revenge themſelves on Saul, 542.
Gideon ſaluted by an angel, the Saviour of his people, 453. Miraculouſly encouraged to undertake the work, ibid. Deſtroys the altar and grove of Baal, ibid. His ſon is ſurnamed Jerubaal, 454. The import of the word, ibid. Defeats with 300 men, the confederate armies of Midian, Amalek, and that of the Arabians, 455. His ſtratagem, ibid. & 456. Puniſhes the magiſtrates of Succoth, for refuſing him and his men a ſmall refreſhment, 457. Puts all the inhabititants of Penuel to death for the ſame fault, ibid. Deſires the Iſraelites, to preſent him with the golden ear-rings they had taken from their enemies, 458. Cauſes an ephod to be made with them in his own city, ib. Dies, 459.
Gilboah mount, 106.
Gilead mount, 106.
Grotius, his opinion concerning the ſtanding of the ſun confuted, 75.

H.

HAIL-STONES make a terrible execution on the confederate army of the Canaanites, 84. Some remarks on that miraculous tranſaction, ibid. & ſeq.
Hareth the foreſt of, whither David retired, 111. & (G).
Hazazel, or ſcape-goat, the etymology of the word, 203, (T). Uſed on the expiation day, ibid. In what manner the lots were caſt, which of the two goats ſhould be ſacrificed on that day, and which ſent away, 205, (V).
Hebrew, its purity, ſimplicity, &c. 401, & ſeq. Its characters, 405, & 406.
Heifer, the ceremony of killing and burning the red heifer, according to the preſcription of Moſes, 209, & ſeq. The water that was mixed with the aſhes of it purified the unclean, and at the ſame time polluted not only thoſe who were present at the slaying of it, but such also as sprinkled the unclean person with it, 210, (Z). Traditions of the Jews relating to this ceremony, ibid.

Hermon mount, remarkable for the dews that fall upon and about it, 98, & 99.

Hiel, the Bethelite, rebuilds Jericho, 69.

High-places expresly forbidden the Jews by God, 353. Abominations committed in them by the Jews, ibid. & seq.

High-priest. Vid. Priesthood, Priest.

Hinnom vale of, near the walls of Jerusalem, 106.

Hon, one of the heads of the house of Reuben, 11. Joins with Korah in a conspiracy against Moses, ibid. His punishment, 14.

Hophni and Phinehas, their vile characters, 477.

Hormah, or Chormah, i. e. utter destruction, the field where the Israelites gained the first victory over Arad, one of the kings of Canaan, 17.

Hushai, his fidelity to David, 534. By David's advice joins Absalom, and disappoints the counsels of Ahithophel, ibid.

I.

JABESH besieged by Nahash king of the Ammonites, 485. Relieved by Saul, 486. All the inhabitants of this place destroyed by the other tribes, except their virgins, who are given in marriage to the Benjamites, 450.

Jacob's well where situate, 133, (N). Description of it, as at present, ibid.

Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, compleats what Deborah had concerted, 452.

Jair, the eighth judge of Israel, judges Israel 22 years, 466.

Jasher, or the upright, book of, 79.

Ibzan, tenth judge of Israel, 474. Judges seven years, ibid.

Idumeans, the whole nation of the Jews sometimes so called, and their country Idumæ from the Edomites, who seized on the southern parts of the country during the Babylonish captivity, 93, & (E).

Jehoshaphat, situation of the valley of Jehoshaphat, 107, (Q). Why so called, ibid. Supposed to be the place appointed for the last and general judgment, ibid. What gave birth to this tradition, ibid. (R).

Jehoshaphat, David's chief secretary, 522.

Jephthah, the son of Gilead, by a concubine, one of the judges, 467. Chief of a band of fugitives, ibid. Entrusted with the command of the army of the Israelites, ibid. His rash vow, 468. Defeats the Ammonites, ibid. Sacrifices his own daughter, ibid.

Jericho,

Jericho, a city of the land of Canaan, why ſo called, 69. Diſmantled by the ſhouts of the Iſraelites, taken and laid in aſhes, no ſoul being ſpared but the harlot Rahab and her family, 68. A prophetical curſe, added by Joſhua, on the man that ſhould attempt to rebuild it, 69. Rebuilt by Hiel the Bethelite, and becomes a famous city, ibid. (C). Balſam of Jericho famous beyond any thing of its kind, 120, &c. Roſes at Jericho ſaid to be of a miraculous nature, 127.

Jeruſalem deſcribed according to the ſacred hiſtorians, 689, & ſeq.

Jeſhurun, righteous, name given to the Jews, not for their righteouſneſs, but for that of their progenitors, 297, (P).

Jews, rebel at Taberah, and an extraordinary fire begins to conſume the extremities of the camp, 2. Which is extinguiſhed at the prayers of Moſes, ibid. A ſupply of quails ſent them, which laſted ten days, 5. A freſh plague deſtroys a great number of the rebels, 6. Spies ſent to view the promiſed land, ibid. Ten of them bring an ill report, ibid. And cauſe an inſurrection, 7. Think of returning into Egypt, ibid. Threaten to ſtone Moſes, endeavouring to quell the tumult, ibid. All above 20 years of age excluded from entering into the promiſed land, ibid. Their raſh and ill-timed exploit againſt the Amalekites puniſhed with a great ſlaughter, 8 & 9. God's wonderful care of this new generation in the wilderneſs, 9. Their raiments continue whole, ibid. Whether this was miraculous, ibid. (L). Stone a ſabbath-breaker, 11. Several of them form a conſpiracy againſt Moſes, ibid. And are miraculouſly puniſhed, 14. Murmur afreſh againſt Moſes, and are puniſhed with a plague, which deſtroyed 14,700 men, ibid. Guilty of ſeveral idolatries not recorded by Moſes, 15. Attempt to enter Canaan by the narrow paſſes, called the way of the ſpies, 17. But routed by Arad, one of the kings of Canaan, ibid. Make a ſecond puſh, defeat the king and deſtroy ſome of his towns, ibid. A new murmuring for want of water, 18. Another for want of proviſions, 19. Multitudes of them deſtroyed by fiery ſerpents, ibid. Recur to Moſes, who, by God's command, ſets up a brazen ſerpent, 20. By looking upon it, thoſe who were bitten by the fiery ſerpents are healed, ibid. God forbids them to commit any hoſtilities againſt the Moabites, and Ammonites, ibid. Arrive at the land of the Amorites, and beg a peaceable paſſage through their territories, which Sihon king of Heſhbon re-fuſing them, they attack him, and overthrow his army in a pitched battle, ſeize upon his kingdom, and put men, women and children to the ſword, 22. Og, king of Baſhan, attempting in like manner to obſtruct their paſſage, undergoes the ſame fate, ibid. Debauched by the women to idolatry, 25. Puniſhed by a plague, which carried off 24,000 of the offenders, ibid. One thouſand more put to death by God's command, ibid. Gain a ſignal victory over five kings of Midian, 26. Put them all to the ſword, ibid. Commanded by Moſes to put to the ſword all the male children, and ſuch women as were not virgins, 27. Being numbered by Moſes, before their entering into the land of promiſe, are found to amount to ſix hundred and one thouſand ſeven hundred and thirty men, able to bear arms, beſides the Levites, 28. Offer part of the Midianitiſh ſpoils to God, 33. Commanded to deſtroy the idols of Canaan, ibid. The limits of the promiſed land appointed, 34. A form of acknowledgment preſcribed to them by Moſes, which they were to make every year, 36. The whole nation renews the covenant which their fathers had made with God in Horeb, 38. Why they diſcontinued circumciſion in the wilderneſs, 46. Their manner of encamping, ibid. Their ſtandards, 51, &c. Their manner of decamping, 54. Their method of engaging their enemies, 57. The ſtate of their hoſt, at their entring into the promiſed land 59. Prepare to march towards Jordan, 62. The order of croſſing the river, ibid. Which divides itſelf to open a dry paſſage, 63. Renew the paſſover, 66. The manner of their taking Jericho, 68. Repulſed at Ai, 70. Achan's crime occaſion of this loſs, 71. Who is ſtoned by the people, ibid. Defeat the confederate army of the Canaanites, 72. Some remarks on the two miraculous tranſactions which happened on this occaſion, viz. The ſtopping of the courſe of the ſun by Joſhua, ibid. And the rain of ſtones, which fell upon the Canaanites, 84. They finiſh the conqueſt of Canaan in ſix years, 72. Deſcription of this land, 90. & ſeq. Their government a theocracy, 149. Their laws, ibid. Laws againſt idolatry, 157. Their poſitive laws concerning the worſhip of the one true God, 159. Laws poſitive and negative, concerning the ſabbath, and paſſover, and other feſtivals, holy-days and faſts, 164, & ſeq. Laws concerning vows, 226, & ſeq. Laws concerning the Prieſts, Levites, and Nethinims, 230, & ſeq. Concerning the ſix cities of refuge, 259, & ſeq. Laws and cuſtoms relating to

Judges

Judges and courts of judicature, 303, & seq. Laws against murder, 315, & seq. Against adultery, and all other unlawful commerce of sexes, 317, & seq. Against theft, 333. Against false witness, coveting another's property, relating to food, raiment, planting, sowing, &c. 338, & seq. Of their customs, 348, & seq. Their arts and trades, 367, &c. Their war, arms, alliances, &c. 368, & seq. Their agriculture, 376. Their trades and manufactures, 380. Dress, ibid. Their poetry, 385. Music and musical instruments, 394, 395. & (O). Their language, 401. Their manner of writing, ibid. Education and learning, 422. Their measuring of time, 427. Their hatred to all foreign, and especially the Greek, languages, 429. Their Synagogues, ibid. Their schools, 430. Their prophets, ibid. Their chronology, 434. A table of their judges 441. Their kings before Jeroboam's revolt, ibid. History of their judges, from the death of Joshua to Saul their first king, 443, &c. Worship the idols of the Canaanites, 445. For their iniquity fall under bondage to Chushan-rishathaim, &c. 451. Fall under the Midianitish bondage, 453. Are delivered from it by Gideon, ibid. & seq. After his death, fall anew into idolatry, 460. Return to their idolatry, and become slaves to the Philistines and Ammonites for 18 years, 467. Delivered by Jephthah 468. Relapse again, and suffer the heavy yoke of the Philistines for forty years, 475. Defeated by them with the loss of the ark, 480. Desire Samuel to appoint them a king, 483. Divided into two kingdoms, 512. Reigns of their kings, ibid. & seq.

Jezreel, the plain of, in Palestine, 109.

Ije-abarim, the 38th encampment of the Israelites, on their march to the promised land, 20.

Joab, the son of Zeruiah, David's general, 513. Defeats Abner, ibid. And kills him, ibid. Made chief general of Israel for his bravery in the siege of Jerusalem, 516. Gains a complete victory over the Ammonites, 524. Takes their metropolis, 525, & seq. His stratagem to get Absalom recalled from banishment, 530. Murders treacherously Amasa, 541. Kills Absalom, 538. David's advice to Solomon touching him, 549. Put to death by Solomon, 550.

Jonadab, his wicked advice to Ammon, 528.

Jonathan, the son of Saul, his intimate friendship with David, 496. Accompanied by his armour-bearer falls upon the Philistines, makes a considerable slaughter of them, and puts them in confusion, 491, &c. His father is prevented from from putting him to death by the army, 490. He and David ſwear a perpetual friendſhip, 501.

Jordan river, its ſource, 115, & 116. Its courſe, ib. The origin of its name, ib. & (T), Moſt full in the time of harveſt, 117. Some of opinion that it has a ſubterraneous communication with the Nile, ibid. & (X). Deſcribed, ib. & 118. The order of the Iſraelites in croſſing it, 62. Divides itſelf to open a dry paſſage, 63. Two monuments of this miraculous paſſage raiſed, 64.

Joſhua, choſen one of thoſe that were ſent to view the land of Canaan, 6. His report, ib. Confirmed by Moſes his ſucceſſor in the moſt ſolemn manner, 29, &c. Inferior in many particulars, not only to Moſes, but to the generality of the prophets, 30, (C). Ninety three years of age when he undertook the conqueſt of the promiſed land, 59. Sends two ſpies to Jericho, ib. Cauſes to be proclaimed through the camp, that they ſhould paſs the Jordan within three days, 62, Communicates to each tribe the order they were to obſerve in their march, ib. Signalized in a miraculous manner, 63. God appears to him in the ſhape of a warrior, 66. And directs the manner in which he would have Jericho beſieged, ib. Takes Jericho in a miraculous manner, adding a prophetic curſe on the man that ſhould attempt to rebuild it, 68, & 69. Ordered by God to diſcover the perſon guilty of ſacrilege at Jericho by lot, 71. How theſe lots were caſt, ib. (E). The ſun ſtands ſtill at his order, 72. The ſyſtem of ſome authors concerning it examined, 74, & ſeq. His death, 443.

Jotham, the ſon of Gideon, the only ſayed by Abimelech, 461. His apologue to the people; ib. Flies to Beor, 463.

Iphigenia the fable of, had its birth probably from the ſacrifice of Jephthah, 469, (O).

Iſh-boſheth proclaimed king of Iſrael, 512. Barbarouſly murdered, 515.

Jubilee year, 195. The etymon of the denomination, ibid. & (O). The beginning of it fixed to the ſeventh month Tiſri, about the time of the autumnal equinox, 196. In what year the jubilee was celebrated, after the entrance of the Iſraelites into the land of Canaan, ibid. & ſeq. Whether celebrated on the 49th or 50th year, 198. How it was to be celebrated, 200. The deſign of this ordinance, ibid.

Judæa, the land of promiſe, ſo called from Judah, the head or chief of the tribes, 92. Vid. Land of Promiſe.

Judah, his lot in the promiſed land, 95.

Judah, wilderneſs of, 110.

Judah, tribe of, appointed to begin the war againſt the Canaanites, 444. This tribe defeated with great loſs by the Benjamites, 448, &c. At laſt defeats the Benjamites, who loſe 25000 men, 449.
Judges and courts of judicature among the Jews, and the qualities requiſite in them, 304, &c. Their courts held at the gates of the cities, 305. Laws relating to theſe courts, 303. Traditions of the Talmudiſts concerning theſe courts, 306, (Y).

K.

KADESH in the wilderneſs of Zin, 17.

Kaphoreth, or mercy-ſeat, etymology of the word, 272, (T). Vid. Mercy-ſeat.
Kibroth-hataavah, or the ſepulchres of concupiſcence, 6.
Kings began early to govern tyrannically, 298. God reſents the Jews deſire of being governed by a king, ibid. Nothing in the whole body of the Moſaic laws to enforce obedience to kings, 299. What meant in ſcripture by the forbidding kings to multiply wives and horſes, ibid. Several divine preſcriptions to the kings of Iſrael, ibid. Their kings uncontrolled, 300: Had a full power, not only in civil and military affairs, but in eccleſiaſtical alſo, 301. Their attire, 302.
Kinnereth, ſea of, 114.
Kohath, one of the three main branches of the Levites, 231.
Korah, the great-grandſon of Levi, by his father Jahar, one of the heads of the tribe, 11. Forms a conſpiracy againſt Moſes, ib. In what year and place this conſpiracy happened, 11. (M). Draws into his intereſt Dathan, Abiram, and Hon, heads of the houſe of Reuben, ibid. Upbraids Moſes and Aaron with engroſſing all the power to themſelves, 12. Deſtroyed with all his accomplices by ſupernatural fire, 14.

L.

LAISH city taken and deſtroyed by the Danites, 447.

Lamb the paſchal, the ordinance of it appointed in oppoſition to the Sabian and Egyptian worſhip, according to ſome moderns, 173, (R).
Land of promiſe known by ſeveral names, as the land of Iſrael, of God, the holy land, Judæa, Paleſtine, Syria, Paleſtina, Idumæa, &c. 90, & ſeq. Why called by theſe ſeveral names, 91, & ſeq. Its ſituation and boundaries, 94. Its diviſion among the children of Iſrael, 95. Its mountains, 97. Its valleys, 106. Plains, 108. Wilderneſſes and deſerts, ferts, 110. Its ſeas, lakes, &c. 111. Its fertility, 119. Its extent, and ſoil, 121. Why ſo much altered for the worſe, 122, & ſeq. Its cities 124. Natural curioſities, ib. & ſeq. Artificial rarities, 137.

Laver, the brazen laver in the court of the tabernacle, 290. Its uſe, ib. Deſcribed, 193.

Law the volume of, kept in the moſt holy place, 276. This was not the holy copy, ib. Why the prototype thus carefully preſerved, 277.

Lebanon the foreſt of, 111.

Le Clerc, his ſyſtem concerning the ſtanding of the ſun conſidered and confuted, 78, & ſeq.

Legion the great plain of, 109.

Leproſy, of all diſeaſes reckoned among the Jews the moſt defiling, 344. Three ſorts of leproſy diſtinguiſhed by Moſes, ib. (G). Thoſe who were infected with it forced to live ſeparate from the reſt, monarchs themſelves not excepted, 345. Even buried in ſeparate places, 346. The prieſts the proper judges both of the malady and the cure, ib. Believed by the Jews to be an immediate judgment from God, ib.

Letters the firſt inventers of, 407, (T).

Levi, the tribe of Levi had no inheritance with the reſt, 28: Being numbered from one month and upwards before entering into the promiſed land, amount to twenty three thouſand. ib.

Levirate the law of, among the Jews, 322. Left by Moſes, in ſome meaſure to a man's choice, 323. How this law is underſtood by the rabbies, ibid. (N).

Levites, how provided for, 220, & ſeq. Conſiſted of three main branches, viz. Gerſhon, Kohath, and Merari, 231. Their conſecration and dreſs, 252, & ſeq. Their revenues, 255. Their rights, privileges and immunities, 256, & ſeq.

Lot the inhabitants of the country pretend to ſhew ſome remains to this day of his metamorphoſed wife, 114, (O).

M.

MAACAH, daughter of Talmai king of Geſhur, wife to David, 513.

Maran-atha, or the Lord comes, or, is at hand, excommunication among the Jews, 314.

Marcheſhvan, the ſecond month of the Jewiſh year, anſwering our October, 190, (K).

Marriage, no man obliged by the law of Moſes to marry, 321, (L). The Jews have always looked upon it as an indiſpenſible duty implied in the words increaſe and multiply, ib. The Jews reſtrained by Moſes, from marrying within certain degrees of conſanguinity, 321. Degrees forbidden as inceſtuous, under pain of death, by Moſes, ibid. Laws of Moſes concerning marriages, ib. & ſeq. Their way of courtſhip, 324. Their manner of celebrating marriage, 326, & ſeq. Ceremonies relating to marriage from the Talmudiſts, 328, (S).

Medad, one of the elders who went not to the tabernacle, but propheſied in the camp, 3, (H). Vid. Eldad.

Mediterranean, called by the Jews the great ſea, the ſea of the Philiſtines, and the ſalt-ſea, 111.

Mephiboſheth, Jonathan's ſon, treated friendly by David, 524.

Merari, one of the three main branches of the Levites, 231.

Mercy-ſeat, propitiatory or oracle deſcribed, 274, & ſeq.

Meribah, (contention) the place where Moſes ſmote the rock to ſupply the murmuring Iſraeliees with water, 18.

Micah, the ſtory of, 445, & ſeq.

Michal, Saul's ſecond daughter married to David, 497. Her ſtratagem to ſave David's life, ibid. Given to another during his exile, 504. Reſtored to him, 514, & ſeq. Deſpiſes David for dancing before the ark, 520.

Millo, joined the Shechemites in proclaiming Abimelech, who meant by, 461, (K).

Minchah, all offerings which had not life, ſo called by the Jews, 214, (A), Divers ſorts of them, ib.

Miriam ſmitten with leproſy, on account of ſome reflections caſt on Moſes with regard to his wife Ziphorah, 6. Is cured by Moſes, ib. Dies in the 130th year of her age, 18. Her ſepulchre was ſtill to be ſeen, according to Euſebius, in his time, ib. (Q). Said by ſome of the fathers to have died a virgin, and to have been the legiſlatrix and governeſs of the Iſraelitiſh women, as her brother Moſes was of the men, ib.

Mitre of the Jewiſh high-prieſt deſcribed, 245, & 246, (B).

Months, the Jews had names for them before the captivity, 189, (K). Their names ib.

Moon, new-moons, feſtivals of the Jews, 186. How they fixed the time of the new moon without aſtronomical tables, ib. (H), Laws concerning this feſtival, 187, & ſeq.

Moſes, extinguiſhes, with his prayers, an extraordinary fire which began to conſume the extremities of the camp of the rebellious Iſraelites, 2. Ordered by God to appoint the great council of ſeventy, ibid. How he choſe theſe ſeventy out of the twelve tribes, ibid. (G). Obtains by his prayers the cure of his ſiſter Miriam who was ſtruck with a leproſy, 6, Chuſes twelve proper men, one out of every tribe, to view the land of Canaan, ibid. Ten of them bring an ill report, ibid. And cauſe an inſurrection, 7. Which he endeavouring to quell was like to have been ſtoned, but miraculouſly ſaved, ibid. Diſſuades in vain, his people from attacking the Amalekites, 8. The Iſraelites routed with great ſlaughter, while he keeps in the camp with the ark, 9. Suppoſed to have compoſed the 90th pſalm in memory of this diſaſter, ibid. Commands a ſabbath-breaker to be put to death, 10, &c. A conſpiracy formed againſt him by Korah and his accomplices, 11, & ſeq. Their dreadful puniſhment, 14. A new inſurrection againſt Moſes, which is puniſhed with a plague, which deſtroyed 14,700 men, ibid. Puts a ſtop to its further progreſs, by ſtanding with his cenſer between the living and the dead, ibid. Smites the rock again, to ſupply the murmuring Iſraelites with water, 18. Why excluded from ſetting his foot in the promiſed land, ibid. Is commanded by God to ſet up a brazen ſerpent, that thoſe who were bitten by the fiery ſerpents that infeſted the Iſraelites might be cured by looking upon it, 20. Commands all the male children of the Midianites, and ſuch of the women as were not virgins, to be put to the ſword, 27. The occaſion of this ſeverity, ibid. (A). Numbers the Iſraelites and directs the diſtribution of the promiſed land to be made by lot, 28. Commanded to take a view of Canaan from Nebo, 29. Knowing that his end was approaching, takes care to have Joſhua confirmed his ſucceſſor in the moſt ſolemn manner. ibid. His ſpeech to the Iſraelites, 34. A ſecond ſpeech, ibid. Preſcribes to the Iſraelites a form of confeſſion, which they were to make every year, when they came to offer the firſt-fruits of their land, 36. Directs Joſhua and the elders to ſet up bleſſings and curſes on mount Ebal and Gerizim, ibid. Aſſembles the whole nation, and makes them renew the covenant made with God in Horeb, 38. His ſong, 39. His laſt bleſſing to the ten tribes, 40. Why Simeon omitted in this bleſſing, 41. Goes up to mount Nebo, ibid. His death, burial, and character, 42. The conteſt which Michael and the devil had about his body, mentioned by St, Jude, probably from an apocryphal book.

book, ibid. (K). His writings, ibid. His writings, and the wonders of his life, multiplied by the rabbies, ibid. Several rabinical dreams, touching his life, embraced and improved by the Mohammedans, ibid.

Mountains, mountain of offence, where ſituate, 134. Why ſo called, ibid.

Mourning, on what occaſion uſed by the Jews, and how performed, 359. Of how long continuance, ibid. Much of the ſeverities abated by the Talmudiſts, ibid. (R).

Murder wilful, no place of refuge for one guilty of it, 259. Accidental and involuntary ſafe in the cities of refuge, ibid. Subject to be killed by the relations of the deceaſed, or to be put to death by the hand of juſtice, if he ventured out of the limits till the death of the high-prieſt, 260. Several laws relating to caſes of man-ſlaughter, 261, & ſeq. God's abhorrence againſt it, 315, & 316. The guilty perſon to be torn from the moſt ſacred places, ibid. Expiated from the time of the flood by the death of the murderer, 315. In what caſes under the law of Moſes, a man might lawfully kill another, 316. An uncertain murder how to be expiated among the Jews, ibid, & ſeq.

N.

NABAL, his rude behaviour to David, 504. Dies, ibid. And David marries his wife Abigail, ibid.

Nadab, killed by fire from heaven, for preſuming to burn incenſe in the tabernacle with ſtrange fire, contrary to Moſes's commadd, 1.

Nathan choſen by God to denounce his ſevere judgments againſt David, 526.

Nazarites, perſons that either dedicated themſelves, or were dedicated by their parents, to obſerve the laws of nazaritehood, 229. Some obliged to it for ſome ſhort ſpace of time, others for all their life, ibid. Obliged to abſtain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, and to wear their hair to its full length, ibid. Women as well as men might bind themſelves to that vow, 230, & ſeq.

Nebo, the mount of, from whence Moſes is commanded to take a view of Canaan, 29. On mount Nebo Moſes dies, 41.

Nehemiah, the well of, 133.

Nethinims, perſons dedicated to the worſhip of God, 264. Etymon of the name, 265. Not of the children of Iſrael, but of the Gibeonites, 264. This name not given them before the captivity, 265. Condemned to the loweſt and moſt laborious offices in the tabernacle under the Levites, ibid.

Niſan, the ſeventh month of the Jewiſh year, anſwering to our March, 190, (K).

O.

OBED-EDOM, the ark depoſited in his houſe, 519.
Oboth, called by Pliny; Eboda, the 37th encampment of the Iſraelites, on their march to the promiſed land, 20.
Offerings, peace-offerings, laws concerning them, 212. Meat and drink-offerings, 213. Offerings for cleanſing, ibid. Offerings of the firſt-fruits, 216, & ſeq. Of the firſt cake of every lump of dough, 217. Of the firſt born, of the tithes, &c. 218, 220, & ſeq. Of incenſe, 224, Burnt-offerings the altar of, where placed, 285. Why called the outward, ibid. Deſcribed, ibid. & ſeq. What meant by the compaſs of the altar, ibid.
Og, Jewiſh fables of his ſize, 22, (X).
Olivet mount, or the mount of olives, why called by the Jews, the mountain of three lights, 103, & (D). Famous on many accounts, 104, & ſeq. Deſcribed, ibid. Falſely ſuppoſed to be in, or on the ſkirts of Galilee, ibid. Held in particular veneration by the Chriſtians for our Saviour's aſcenſion into heaven, 105. Nor much leſs by the Mohammedans, ibid.
Oreb, his head carried to Gideon, 456.
Othniel takes Kirjath Sepher, 444. Marries Caleb's daughter, ibid. Son of Kenaz, firſt couſin to Caleb, ibid. (A). The firſt judge of Iſrael, 451. Gains a ſignal victory over Cuſhan-riſhataim, king of Meſopotamia, ibid.

P.

PARABLES, that of Jothan the firſt we read of, 462. (L). The Greeks falſly boaſt themſelves the authors of parables, ibid. In uſe among the Jews when unknown to the Greeks, ibid. Who the firſt authors of them uncertain, ibid. How that expreſſion of our Saviour, that he ſpoke in parables to the people, that hearing they might not underſtand, is to be underſtood, 463, (L).
Paſſover, or Eaſter, laws relating to it, 170, & ſeq. Penalties appointed for ſuch as ſhould omit the celebration of it, 171, & (P). The etymology of its name, ibid. (Q).
Peirerius, his ſyſtem concerning the ſtanding of the ſun conſidered and confuted, 76, & ſeq.
Pelethites, who, 523, (C).
Penteceſt, or the feaſt of the weeks inſtituted in memory of the law being given on mount Sinai, 176. When to be kept, 177. What ſacrifices to be offered, ibid. Other regulations relating thereto, 176, & (W), (X).

Penuel

Penuel refuſes a refreſhment to Gideon and his men, 456. All the inhabitants by him put to the ſword, 457.
Peræa, the Greek name of the country of Baſhan beyond the Jordan, 94.
Pergamus king, rather the improver than the inventer of parchment, 421.
Perjury, the law of Moſes puniſhed it with death, 336.
Phiala, the lake of, the true ſource of the Jordan, 115, & (S). Deſcribed, ibid.
Phinehas, puts to death Zimri, for bringing a Midianitiſh princeſs into the camp, and, for his zeal, the high-prieſthood is confirmed to him and his ſeed, 26.
Phinehas and Hophni, ſons of Eli, their vile character, 476.
Phunon, ſince known by the name of Metallo Phunon, one of the encampments of the Iſraelites, on their march to the promiſed land, 20.
Piſgah, an encampment of the Iſraelites on their march to the promiſed land, 21.
Planets, how they came firſt to be worſhipped, 427, (L). The planetary diviſion of the week, by whom invented, ibid.
Poetry, the nature, metre, and cadence of the Hebrew ſcarce poſſible to be determined, 385, & ſeq. Lyric poetry not invented by Orpheus, 392.
Points Hebrew, when introduced, 415, & ſeq. An account of them, 417, (B).
Polygamy allowed the Jews, 322. Diſtinction among them between the wives of the firſt and ſecond rank, ibid. (M). The ſecond no where in the Hebrew text called concubines, Harlots, or proſtitutes, as moſt verſions render the word Pilagſhim, ibid.
Pools of Solomon deſcribed, 142.
Potter's field, now Campo Santo, its earth ſaid to be of an extraordinary nature, 133. (C).
Prieſts, high-prieſt the head of the Jewiſh church, 232. The final judge of all controverſies, both as to religion and common juſtice, ibid. Laws relating to his office, 233. To his conſecration, ibid, & ſeq. To his dreſs, 238. & ſeq.
Prieſthood among the Jews, or ſacrificature at firſt belonged to the firſt-born, 230. Afterwards the tribe of Levi ſet apart for the inferior, and the family of Aaron for the higher offices of the miniſtry, ibid. High-prieſthood given ſolely to the family of Aaron, ibid. & 231.
Prieſts among the Jews, their conſecration, 248. Office, 250. Dreſs, 252. Subordinate to the high-prieſt, and of of a rank superior to the Levites, 248. Laws concerning them, ibid.

Property, laws against coveting another man's, 339.
Prophet, the signification and import of the word, 430, (M). The number of prophets from Abraham to Malachi, 433. Their names, and those of the prophetesses, ibid, (O). How God revealed himself to them, 434. Their food, dress, and manner of living, 430, & 431.
Proselytes among the Jews, such as were circumcised admitted to eat of the passover, and to all other religious priviledges with the Israelites, 293. Such as were not circumcised kept in a state little better than slavery, ibid. What meant by proselytes of the gate, and proselytes of righteousness, ibid. Difference made by Moses between nation and nation, with respect to their admission, 294.
Ptolemais, or St. John d'Acre, or Acra, its ruins described, 137.
Punishment, an account of those which were either appointed by the Mosaic law, or made use of at the prince's will before the captivity, 310, & seq.
Purim, or Lot's feast of, 188.

Q

Quadrantana, or Quarantania, the mountain where the devil, they say, took our blessed Saviour to tempt him with the delusive sight of the earth, 126. Stones shewn here, which the inhabitants believe to be the same which the devil would have converted into loaves, ibid.

R

RACHEL, her tomb near Bethlehem remarkable for small stones to be seen there resembling peas, and ascribed to a miracle of the virgin Mary, 125.
Rahab, spared in the destruction of Jericho, because she received and concealed in her house, the two spies sent by Joshua, 61. It does not appear from the text that she was an harlot, but an inn-keeper, 60, (X). Receives assurance that her house should be exempted from the common ruin, 61. Her whole family saved with her; 68. Embraces the Jewish religion, is married to Salmon, and incorporated into the Jewish commonwealth, 69.
Rain of stones which fell upon the Canaanites considered, 84, & seq. Like instances out of history, 86.
Refuge, cities of, among the Jews, 259. Designed to protect innocent persons only, ibid. These cities were designed not only for the Israelites, but for all strangers, 261. Several laws relating to them, ib. & seq. The tabernacle, and afterwards the temple and altar places of refuge, 264.

Rempham,

Remphan, one of the Jewish idols in the desert, 16.
Rephaim, the vale of, called also the vale of the Titans, or the Giants, 106.
Reuben, his lot in the promised land, 95.
Rizpah, one of Saul's concubines, her concern for the death of her sons, 542.

S

SABBATH, laws positive and negative concerning it, 164. The abstaining from work stretched by the Jews to the most superstitious degree, ibid. (M). Several extravagant notions of the Jews about the sabbath, ibid. The observation of the sabbath, asserted by some Jews and Christians to be as old as the creation, ib. Whether given to the Israelites as a memorial of their deliverance from the Egyptian yoke, and to distinguish them from all other nations, ibid. What meant in the gospel by the second sabbath after the first, or the second prime sabbath, ibid.
Sabbatic year, laws concerning it, 190. In what time of the year it was to begin, ibid. (L). How soon after their entrance into the land of Canaan it began to be observed, ib.
Sacrifice, the daily sacrifice, laws concerning it, 212.
Sacrificing, the manner of sacrificing living creatures among the Jews, 223, (M).
Salt, the valley of, famed for the overthrow of the Edomites there, 106.
Salt-sea; see Asphaltite lake.
Samachonite lake, from whence it derives its name uncertain, 115. Described, ibid. Some derive its name from Samach, a fish, ibid. (R).
Samaria, called in future ages Sebaste, 138. Its ruins, ibid.
Samaritan alphabet, 406. Whether the Samaritan was the antient Hebrew, 408.
Samuel obtained by the prayers of his mother, 478. Dedicated to God by a solemn vow, enters into his service at the age of three years old, ibid. The heavy judgment against Eli's house revealed to him, ibid. &c. Obtains by his prayers a signal victory over the Philistines, 482. The Jews enjoy a profound peace in the time of his government, ibid. His sons do not follow their father's footsteps, but suffer themselves to be bribed, 483. Endeavours to dissuade the people from creating a king, 483. Anoints Saul king, 485. Justifies his conduct during the time of his administration, in the presence of the new king, 486. His design in so doing, 487. Upbraids Saul for not waiting for him, 489. Anoints David in Saul's room, 493.

His

His death, 503. His apparition, 508. Circumſtances of this apparition, ibid. (P).
Sanhedrin of the Jews, ſome of opinion that it was the council of 70 elders continued, 4, (H). No mention of ſuch a high court till the time of the Maccabees, 5, (H).
Saron, or Saronas, the northern part of the plain of Legion, 109.
Saul, the ſon of Kiſh, anointed king of Iſrael by Samuel, 484. Preſented by Samuel to the people, and received with great applauſe, ibid. Raiſes the ſiege of Jabeſh-gilead with a great ſlaughter of the Ammonites, 486. His moderation, ib. Defeats the Philiſtines at Michmaſh, 491. Tormented by an evil ſpirit, finds relief from David's playing on the harp, 494. Makes David his armour-bearer, ibid. His jealouſy againſt David, by what occaſioned, 496. Endeavours to kill him, 497. Gives him his ſecond daughter, ib. Commands the high-prieſt Ahimelech, with others, to be put to death in his preſence, 500, &c. And orders the whole city of Nob to be put to the ſword, ibid. Conſults the witch of Endor, 507. Offers up victims without attending Samuel, 489. Upbraided by Samuel, ibid. He is rejected, 492. What was the crime he was guilty of, 489. (C). His body, with the bodies of his three ſons, hung upon the walls of Bethſhan, 511, Sea ſalt. Vid. Aſphaltite.
Sea dead. Vid. idem.
Sebaſta, or the antient Samaria, its ruins, 138.
Sebat, the fifth month of the Jewiſh year, anſwering to our January, 190.
Sects among the antient Jews, according to the Talmudiſts, 432, (N). Alluded to by St. Paul, Rom. 5, ibid.
Seir, the wilderneſs of, 9.
Sepulchres of the kings of Jeruſalem, 139. What kings buried there, ibid. (R). Deſcription of the place, 140. Sepulchres of the Jews, 363. The ſepulchres of the kings of Judah in that part of Jeruſalem where the temple ſtood, 364. That of David ſtill to be ſeen, ibid. Deſcription of it, ibid. Broken open by Hircan the high-prieſt, and 3000 talents taken out of it, ibid. A prodigious treaſure taken out of it by Herod, ibid.
Serpent, the nature of the fiery ſerpents that infeſted the Iſraelites, 19, (S).
Shamgar delivers the Iſraelites from the yoke of the Philiſtines, and kills 600 of them with an ox-goad, 451, &c.
Sharon, the country of, 109, (A).

Shaveh the valley, called the field of kings, or the king's dale, 108, & (T). Famous for the interview between Abraham and Melchiſedec, ibid.
Shaul; ſee Saul, &c.
Sheba raiſes a revolt of the tribes againſt David, 540. Murdered, 541.
Shechemites, and thoſe of Millo, proclaim Abimelech king, 461.
Shekel Jewiſh, an account of, 410.
Shematta, or excommunication, 314, & (E).
Shew-bread, why called in the original bread of faces, 215. How and of what made, ibid. Laws concerning it, ibid. The table of ſhew-bread deſcribed, 281, & ſeq.
Shibboleth, pronounced by the Ephraimites Sibboleth, 473.
Shimei's villainous behaviour to David, 534. Inſtructions relating to him, given by David to Solomon, 549. Put to death, 550.
Shittim, the vale of, its ſituation quite uncertain, 106.
Shittim-wood, various opinions of authors concerning it, 268, (Q).
Siloam, the pool of, 134, (E).
Siloe, where ſituate, ibid.
Simeon, why omitted in Moſes's bleſſing, 41. His lot in the promiſed land, 95.
Sion mount, 106.
Sivan, the ninth month of the Jewiſh year, anſwering to our May, 190, (K).
Solomon, king of Judæa, born, 528. Proclaimed king, 546. Puts to death Adonijah and Joab, 551. And Shimei, ibid. Marries the daughter of Pharaoh king of Egypt, ibid. Believed to have compoſed the 45th pſalm and canticles as an epithalamium, 552, (B). Chooſes wiſdom, ibid. A pregnant proof of it, 553. His magnificence, ibid. Builds the temple, 556.
Spies, twelve ſent by Moſes to view the promiſed land, 6. Ten of them bring an ill report, ibid. And cauſe an inſurrection, 7. All deſtroyed by a ſudden death, 8. A faſt kept by the Jews to this day in memory of their puniſhment, ibid. Spies ſent by Joſhua to Jericho, 59. Concealed by Rahab, ſwear to ſave her and her family, 61. Return to the camp and make their report, 62.
Spinoza, his ſyſtem concerning the ſun's ſtanding ſtill examined and confuted, 75.
Stones, rain of, which fell upon the Canaanites, 84. Le

Clerc's notion confuted, ibid. Several like inſtances out of hiſtory, 86. Some cauſed by hurricanes and earthquakes, 87. Others ingender in the air, ibid.

Stoning, the moſt uſual capital puniſhment among the Jews, 310. What crimes deſerved this death, 311. The manner of this execution, ibid.

Strangling, one of the capital puniſhments among the Jews, 313. What crimes were puniſhed with this death, ibid. The manner of this execution, ibid.

Succoth, the city of, refuſes Gideon and his men a refreſhment, 456. Who puniſhes 77 of the chief magiſtrates, 457. What puniſhment inflicted on them, ibid. (E).

Sun, his ſtanding ſtill at Joſhua's order, 72. How his words muſt be underſtood, 73, (G). The ſyſtem of Maimonides and Spinoza concerning it conſidered and rejected, 75. And that of Grotius, ibid. And of Peirerius, 76, & ſeq. And that of Le Clerc, 78, & ſeq.

Synagogues, when introduced among the Jews, 429.

T

TABERAH, or Burning, the place where the Iſraelites beginning to rebel, an extraordinary fire began to conſume their camp, 2.

Tabernacle, built by the direction of God himſelf, 266. Why called Obel in the Moſaic writings, 267. Whether borrowed from the Egyptians, ibid. Its form, make, dimenſions, &c. 268, & ſeq. Its court deſcribed, 282, & ſeq.

Table, of the Iſraelitiſh judges, 441. Of the Jewiſh kings before Jeroboam's revolt, ibid. Of Judah and Iſrael, after the diviſion of the two kingdoms, 442.

Temple of Jeruſalem, 556.

Temple of Solomon, deſcribed according to the ſacred books, 560, & ſeq.

Thabor mount, called alſo Itabyrion and Atabyrion, deſcribed, 101, Called Tabor in Hebrew, or Navel, from its form, ibid. (Z). Remarkable for the regularity of its form and proportion of its parts, 101. In great veneration from the earlieſt times, ibid. Doubted by ſome, whether the miracle of the transfiguration was wrought here, 102.

Thammuz, the tenth month of the Jewiſh year, anſwering to our June, 189, (K).

Thebet, the fourth month of the Jewiſh year, anſwering to our December, 189, (K).

Theft, the ſtealing of a man the only capital theft under the law of Moſes, 333. Other thefts how puniſhed, 334. Petty larcenies how puniſhed, 335.

Tiberias,

Tiberias, the ſea of, called alſo the ſea of Kinnereth, the water of Geneſar, the lake of Geneſarit, the ſea of Galilee, 114. From whence it borrowed theſe names, ibid. (P). Deſcribed, ibid.
Tiſri, one of the Jewiſh months, anſwering to part of our September, 179. The firſt of the civil year, 183 & 189, (K).
Tithes, the chief income of the prieſts and Levites, 220. None, conſiſting of clean animals to be redeemed at any rate; and thoſe which conſiſted of the fruits of the earth, not to be bought off without paying one fifth part more than their intrinſic value, ibid. Several ſorts of tithes, and laws relating to them, 221, & ſeq. The manner in which the cattle was decimated, 222.
Titles unknown among the Jews, 358.
Tola, the ſon of Puah, of the tribe of Iſſachar, ſixth judge of Iſrael, 466. Judges Iſrael twenty three years, ibid.
Trumpets, the feaſt of, among the Jews, 183. Authors much divided about the reaſon of this feſtival, 184. Sacrifices proper for this ſolemnity, 186.

V

VEADAR, or ſecond Adar, the intercalar month among the Jews, 189, (K).
Vail of the tabernacle deſcribed, 270.
Unclean meats, the prohibition of, had not its origin from the Moſaic law, 341. Which clean, and which unclean, ib. Why the fat of clean beaſts forbidden, ibid. & (E).
Vows of a two-fold nature among the Jews, 226. Various inſtances of anathemas, or things vowed to deſtruction, 227, & ſeq. Laws concerning all ſorts of vows, 226.
Uriah, killed by David's direction, 526.
Urim and Thummim, an appendage of the high-prieſt's garment, 30, (C). Signify in the original light and perfection, ibid. By whom it was to be conſulted, ibid. How the ceremony of conſulting it was performed, ibid. How this divine oracle gave its anſwer; how long it continued, ibid. The Egyptians had an oracle not unlike this, which they called truth, ibid. Various opinions of the learned about its form and make, 242, & ſeq, Uſury, all kind of, forbidden from one Iſraelite to another, by the law of Moſes, 337. How puniſhed, ibid. It was permitted to take ſome uſury from the Gentiles, ibid.
Uzzah ſmitten with immediate death for touching the ark, 518.

W

WASHING the feet, how and on what occaſion this ceremony was performed among the Jews, 351.
Waters of jealouſy, Moſes commanded to appoint them, 318. In what manner this ceremony was performed, ibid. & ſeq.
Weeks feaſt of, why inſtituted, 176. So called from the ſeven weeks which were reckoned from that of the paſſover, ib. & (Y). Vid. Pentecoſt.
Witneſs, laws againſt falſe witneſſes, 338. Who excepted among the Jews from being witneſſes, ibid. (B).

X

XYlophoria, a feſtival of the Jews, ſo called by Joſephus, 266.

Y

YEARS, four ſorts of years diſtinguiſhed by the Moſaic law, 188. The year of the Jews conſiſted of 365 days, of 12 ſolar months, the laſt of which conſiſted of 35 days, 189, (K). Sabbatic year, jubilee year. Vid. Sabbatic, Jubilee.
Yiar, the eighth month of the Jewiſh year, anſwering to our April, 190, (K).

Z

ZACHARY, ſepulchre of, in the valley of Jehoſhaphat, deſcribed, 147, & (M).
Za-cho-ne, a remarkable fruit in the plain of Jericho, ſo called by the Arabs, 126.
Zadok, the ſon of Abitub, declared high-prieſt of the Jews, for his adherence to Solomon, 549.
Zālmonah, ſo called from the image or figure of the brazen ſerpent which Moſes cauſed to be erected there, 19.
Zaretan, a city, called afterwards Zeredatha, famous for the copper-works which Hiram caſt there for the temple of Solomon, 63, & (Y).
Zeal, the right of, made it lawful to kill ſome kind of offenders upon the ſpot, 316.
Zebul, ſervant of Abimelech, by his command kills him, 466.
Zelophehad, of the tribe of Manaſſeh, his five daughters petition Moſes and Eleazar for an inheritance with their father's brethren, 29. A portion allotted to them in their kindred's inheritance, ibid. A law made in favour of the daughters and heireſſes on this occaſion, ibid.
Ziba, the treacherous ſervant of Mephiboſheth, his behaviour towards David, 534.

Ziklag, the abode of David, taken and burnt by the Amalekites, 506, 507.
Zimri, one of the chiefs of Simeon, brings a young Midianitiſh princeſs into the camp, 26. For which crime he is killed by Phinehas, ſon of Eleazar, ibid.
Zin, wilderneſs of, 17.
Zion, fortreſs of, taken by Joab from the Jebuſites, 516. Enlarged and fortified by David, and made his reſidence, ibid. Called the city of David, ibid.

End of the Third Volume.

Directions to the BOOKBINDER for placing the CUTS.

1. Camp of the Iſraelites Page 58
2. Map of the journey in the Wilderneſs and of the Conqueſt and partition of the Land of Canaan 88
3. Plan of the Temple of Jeruſalem 560
4. Plan of the City of Jeruſalem. 608